

H B BOUND TO PLEASE ®

The Heritage of India Series

ISLAM IN INDIA AND PAKISTAN

MURRAY T. TITUS

Y.M.C.A. PUBLISHING HOUSE
5, RUSSELL STREET, CALCUTTA 16

ISLAM IN INDIA AND PAKISTAN

A Religious History of Islam in India and Pakistan

BY

MURRAY T. TITUS

Ph.D. (Hartford, K.S.M.), D.D. (Ohio Wesleyan)

Y.M.C.A. PUBLISHING HOUSE
5 RUSSELL STREET, CALCUTTA-16

1959

First published 1930
Revised reprint 1959

This revised reprint of Islam in India is being published jointly by the Christian Students' Library and the YMCA Publishing House—each under its own imprint.

PRINTED IN INDIA
AT THE DIOCESAN PRESS, MADRAS—1959. C8798

To
THE MEMORY OF
DUNCAN BLACK MACDONALD GUIDE, COUNSELLOR FRIEND

AND

SAMUEL MARINUS ZWEMER
'Apostle to Islam'

PREFACE

I

NOTHING is so fascinating as the study of a people. The Muslims of India are particularly interesting, but, strange to say, little has ever been written about them. True, political histories deal with their conquests and political life, but the people themselves and their religion have had scant attention.

The first attempt to write of the Muslims of India was made in 1832, when G. A. Herklots, M.D., surgeon in the Madras Establishment, induced a Deccanī Muslim, Ja'far Sharif, to write an account of 'The Customs of the Musalmans of India', under the title Qānūn-i-Islām, which he translated from the Deccanī Urdū into English, adding some comments of his own. In the same year there appeared Observations on the Mussulmauns of India, which were the 'home letters' of an English woman, Mrs. Mir Hasan 'Alī. As the wife of a Shi'ah Muslim of good family, she had long lived in Lucknow, and she intimately describes the life of the high class Muslims of that city. A few years ago both these books were revised and republished by the Oxford University Press.

W. W. Hunter in 1871 published The Indian Musulmans, but this deals mostly with the political aspects of the Wahhabī activities. In 1896 Sir T. W. Arnold published The Preaching of Islam, in which he devoted a chapter to the peaceful spread of Islam in India. Many scattered articles, too, have appeared from time to time, dealing with various aspects of Islam in India, but nowhere is there to be found any comprehensive treatment of Indian Islam from the standpoint of religious history.

It is with the greatest diffidence, therefore, that this book has been attempted. The ground is so unbroken, the field is so vast, the resources, though often hidden, are so varied and extensive, and one's lack of knowledge in such an enormous field is such a handicap, that it has been difficult to make progress. The manners and customs, as well as the main theological outlines of Islam, have been excluded.

The former have been omitted because they may be found in great detail in the revised edition of Herklots' Islam in India, so ably prepared by W. Crooke; the latter because there was no need to repeat what had been done before, and so well, by Margoliouth, Sell, and many others. I have, therefore, confined myself to a discussion of the religious history of Islam in India: how it came, how it spread, how it divided and subdivided, how it has been affected by its environment, and how it has reacted to modern conditions.

While it has been my constant aim to treat this subject without bias and prejudice, and I hope not without some measure of success, yet it has been difficult at times to know just what testimony was the most reliable, and what conclusions would be the most just and fair. In all cases the attempt has been made to seek out the facts from purely Islamic sources, or from actual personal experience. If there has been failure to do justice to Indian Islam it has not been because of lack of desire.

Conscious as I am of the inadequate treatment that has been given to many subjects, I earnestly solicit the criticism of readers who are in a better position to correct the deficiencies, which only patient and scholarly investigation can remove.

In the main, the system adopted for the transliteration of Arabic and Persian words is that of the Transliteration Committee of the Tenth International Congress of Orientalists (Geneva, 1894). The chief exception is in the case of the assimilation of the article to the solar letters. This was done to guide those who are not familiar with the pronunciation of Arabic; and, as for those who do know, it will be no hindrance to their perceiving what the original was. Some few words, such as current proper names, are spelled according to usage. Usage, likewise, has governed the spelling of others, as maulvī rather than maulawī, which would hardly be recognized.

A word of explanation is needed regarding the Appendix. An attempt has been made to make it, in a sense, the focus of the book. I would scarcely have thought of preparing it in its present form but for the fact that the idea occurred to me after seeing the 1925 Annuaire of the Revue du Monde Musulman, which contains such excellently arranged reference material. Accordingly, I am greatly indebted to M. Louis Massignon, editor of the Revue, who has graciously given me permission to translate, use and adapt this material for the Appendix. The statistical tables have been compiled from the Census of India Report for 1921.

This book was written as a thesis for the Faculty of the Kennedy School of Missions, of the Hartford Seminary Foundation, Hartford, Conn., U.S.A., in partial fulfilment of the requirement for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. It is the product of nineteen years' residence in India, but was started only ten years ago, at the request of the late Dr. J. N. Farquhar, without whose constant encouragement, as well as that of my valued friend and teacher, Dr. D. B. Macdonald, it would never have seen the light of day. I am deeply indebted for helpful suggestions to Dr. S. M. Zwemer, Dr. W. G. Shellabear, Sir Thos. W. Arnold, Mr. J. A. Subhan, Miss Marjorie Dimmitt and Mr. Z.A. Hashmie, Deputy Collector. My thanks are due, also, to many others, who have kindly assisted me with their information and criticisms. Last of all thanks are due to my wife, for her tireless patience and labour in assisting in the revision of the manuscript for the press, as well as for her inspiring confidence, which has kept me at the task.

Budaun, India
November, 1929

M.T.T.

II

ISLAM IN INDIA AND PAKISTAN

More than a quarter-of-a-century has elapsed since the publication of Indian Islam by the Oxford University Press, under the auspices of the Literature Department of the National Council of the Young Men's Christian Associations of India, Burma and Ceylon. With the partition of India and the birth of Pakistan in August, 1947 a wholly new situation, with reference to the Muslims of the Indian peninsula was created. This vivisection of India, and the creation of a new nation, Pakistan, which is the largest Muslim nation in the world, has made necessary the revision of Indian Islam under a new title: Islam in India and Pakistan.

This revision is being undertaken at the request and under the auspices of the Department of Literature of the Council of the Y.M.C.As. of India and Ceylon. In this connection I would especially mention Dr. P. D. Devanandan, Ph.D and Sri S. P. Appasamy, M.A. of this Department of Literature for their encouragement and assistance. I am also grateful to Dr. Wilfred Cantwell Smith, the founder and Principal of the Institute of Islamic Studies, McGill University, Montreal, Canada for his helpful encouragement.

I am also greatly indebted to the London Offices of the High Commissioners for India and Pakistan respectively, for kindly supplying me with copies of the Constitutions of their respective countries, as well as other very useful information. I am also grateful to old friends and fellow-workers of former days in India: Dr. J. W. Sweetman, Dr. E. C. Dewick, Dr. J. N. Hollister and the Rev. L. Bevan Jones for their encouragement and help.

I must also express appreciation to those who have helped in the solution of various special problems:

Maulana Sayyid Husain Ahmad Madini, Principal, Dar-ul-'Ulum, Deoband, U.P.;

The Rev. Harold Spencer, Principal, Henry Martyn School of Islamic Studies, Aligarh;

The Rt. Rev. G. Sundaram, Bishop of Lucknow Area, The Methodist Church;

Dr. M. Majeed, Shekih-ul-Jamia Millia Islamia, Jamia Nagar, New Delhi.

Prof. Kingsley Davis, Ph. D., University of California.

Also, I am indebted to my son-in-law, the Rev. D. P. Hardy, M.A. (I.C.S. retired) for making valuable criticisms and suggestions for the chapter on the making of Pakistan (The Parting of the Ways).

And finally I wish to express my thanks to the various publishers who have granted me permission to quote from their books.

MURRAY T. TITUS

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. THE RELIGIOUS OBJECTIVE OF THE MUSLIM CONQUERORS	1
II. THE METHODS OF THE CONQUERORS ..	15
III. PEACEFUL PENETRATION	36
IV. ORGANIZATION OF THE SUNNI COMMUNITY	54
V. SHI'AHS AND MAHDAWIS	87
VI. RELIGIOUS ORDERS	116
VII. SAINT-WORSHIP	137
VIII. ISLAM IN ITS HINDU ENVIRONMENT ..	153
IX. MODERN MOVEMENTS: REACTIONARY AND PROGRESSIVE	185
X. THE PARTING OF THE WAYS	215
XI. THE NEW MUSLIM APOLOGETIC AND POLEMIC	245
APPENDIX	273
BIBLIOGRAPHY	296
GLOSSARY OF ISLAMIC TERMS	305
INDEX	322

TABLE OF ABBREVIATIONS

- A.R. . . . Asiatic Researches.
- A.S.B. . . . Asiatic Society of Bengal.
- B.G. . . . The Bombay Gazetteer.
- C.I.R. . . . The Census of India Report.
- E.D. . . . Elliot, Sir H.M., and Dowson, J.: The History of India as Told by Its Own Historians, 8 vols, London, 1867-77.
- E.I. . . . Encyclopedia of Islam, Luzac & Co., London.
- G.T.C.P. . . . Rose, H.A. : A Glossary of the Tribes and Castes of the Punjab and North-West Frontier Province.
- I.G. . . . The Imperial Gazetteer of India.
- J.A.S.B. . . . The Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.
- J.R.A.S. . . . The Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society.
- M.W. . . . The Muslim World.
- P.R.F.L. . . . Crooke, W. : Popular Religion and Folklore of Northern India.
- R.M.M. . . . Revue du Monde Musulman.
- T.C.B. . . . Tribes and Castes of Bengal.
- T.R.A.S. . . . Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society.

CHAPTER I

THE RELIGIOUS OBJECTIVE OF THE MUSLIM CONQUERORS

India, so commonly described as the land of the Vedas and the home of the Hindus, is also the Motherland of the largest Muslim population found in any single country of the world. With the total of an estimated 365,000,000 Muslims in the world today, approximately every seventh person is a Muslim, and of these nearly every third one belongs to the combined area of Pakistan, India and Kashmir !

Only by comparison with other Muslim nations can these enormous figures be appreciated. In East Pakistan (East Bengal) for example, there is a larger Muslim population than is to be found in the whole of Arabia and Iran combined.¹ At the same time Pakistan with its total Muslim population of 64,959,000² is the largest Muslim country of the world. India³ alone has a Muslim community of 35,400,117 after Partition, (exclusive of Kashmir with some 2,750,000) which is almost as large a number of Muslims as is to be found in Turkey and Iran together. Therefore the India-Pakistan area, with its more than one hundred million Muslims, is one of the most important Muslim areas of the world today !

Another feature of the Muslim population of this wide area which attracts attention is its dispersion far beyond the borders of both Pakistan and India. This fact, which is a matter of far-reaching importance, has arisen almost entirely since the close of the nineteenth century. Muslims from this area today are to be found in East Africa, South Africa, Madagascar, Mauritius, Argentina, Brazil, Guiana, Trinidad, the West Indies, Great Britain, Australia, Germany, France, the United States and Canada. In each of these countries there are sizeable groups actively engaged in business of one sort or another. Also there are important groups earnestly engaged in religious propaganda. In fact it is this group of Muslims from India and Pakistan, who today lead the Muslims of the world in their zeal and practical endeavour for the spread of their faith.

¹ Pakistan Census Report, 1951.

² Ditto.

³ India Census Report, 1951.

As we contemplate this great religious community, divided as it is today between India and Pakistan, and consider its wide distribution stretching across more than two thousand miles from Baluchistan to Assam, and from Kashmir to the very southern tip of the Indian Peninsula, there arises before us a multitude of questions which press for an answer. How did Islam enter India? What were the motives of the conquerors? Was Islam always spread by the sword? Why are there so many sects and divisions among the Muslims of India and Pakistan? How are they organized, and what contribution have they made to the social and religious life of the country? What has been the effect of the Hindu environment? What movements have arisen to modify the religious and social life under the pressure of modern conditions, and what effect does the tumult in the Muslim world have upon these Indian masses? In short, what is the history of the religious quest of the Muslim people of India and Pakistan?

Others have told of the military and political achievements, and the glories of the Mughul Empire. Still others have described the genius of the Muslim poets, artists, and builders. The manners and customs and, to some extent, the religious beliefs of the various sects have already been described. The object of this book is different. It is an attempt to consider Islam in India from the standpoint of its religious mission, the manner of its spread, the means by which its teachings were disseminated, and its institutions established. The conquests of armies, the courts of kings and emperors, arts and commerce will be touched upon only as they are laid under tribute to serve the end in view. The task is an enormous one, and the writer is conscious of its exacting requirements, but he may at least be able to blaze a trail, which can be followed by other investigators, or suggest an outline that will stimulate further research in a field of unbounded interest.

INDIA'S OPEN DOORS

India, with its heart-shaped peninsula stretching south into the Indian Ocean, is compassed by two great natural barriers, the mountains and the sea. But these could not serve to keep her completely isolated from the rest of the world, even in ancient times. There were gateways through the towering Himalayas, and the 'Black Water' could be crossed. Long before the coming of the Muḥammadan invader, Aryan hordes from Central Asia had poured through the Khyber Pass and conquered the country, and in turn had been assimilated by it. When the Muslim armies of 'Umar and 'Uthmān were spreading Islam in the seventh century A.D. toward the north, west, and east, and were pressing ever nearer and nearer to the borders of Sind, they would no doubt, have made good their entrance into India at that time, had it not been for these difficult barriers.

There are three doors by which an invader can enter India. First, there is the sea. But in these early times kings did not venture to send their armies across the waters. The only Muslim invaders who did come by this open door were of the peaceful sort, Arab merchants from Ḥaḍramawt and Iraq.

Secondly, there is the land entrance, which leads from Mesopotamia and South Persia through Baluchistan, south of the mountains of Makrān into Sind. The dry and desert character of this route prevented its being used, and only once did the Arab armies succeed in effecting a successful entry by it into India.

The third entrance is through the Khyber Pass on the north-west frontier, through which, from the earliest times, wave upon wave of humanity has passed down out of the mountain heights and fastnesses of Central Asia to the ever-alluring plains of Hindustan. This door has always been open to any invader who has had the genius and daring to lead his army through it. By this route the Turk, Mongol, and Afghān forces of Islam were led into India. These were destined to found an empire not only of kings and rulers, who dwelt in crumbling forts and palaces, but, more important still for the history of India, an empire of the heart reared upon the foundations of a new religious faith, whose ruler dwells in temples not made with hands. Through all three of these doors the Muslims entered : the warrior and trader, the learned and the pious, the Arab, Persian, Turk, and Mongol—all of them missionaries of the Crescent for the establishment of the faith of Islam in the ancient country of the Hindu.

EARLY ATTEMPTS AT INVASION

The western coast of India had been the object of plunder by piratical Arab expeditions from earliest times. Although the historians tell us that in the caliphate of 'Umar (A.D. 634-644) expeditions were sent to the towns on this coast, yet there is nothing to indicate that they had any religious significance.¹

The first recorded appearance of Muslim arms in India beyond the coast seems to have been in the year A.D. 664, within thirty-two years of the Prophet's death. This was immediately following the invasion of Afghānistān, the capture of Kābul, and the reported conversion of twelve thousand persons in that region. Though the forces led by General al-Muhallab at that time evidently penetrated as far as Multan, east of the Indus River, and although he carried away many captives to become slaves of Arab masters, it does not appear that he made any attempt either to subdue the country he entered, or to establish the new religion of the conquering Arabian nation.²

THE ARAB CONQUEST OF SIND

The history of Islam in India properly begins in the year A.D. 711, when it was introduced into Sind by the Arabian general, 'Imād-ud-dīn Muhammad bin Quāsīm. He led thither an expedition, which was sent by Ḥajjaj bin Yūsuf, governor of Baṣrah.³ From that time Sind was never without Muslim influence; and the fact that its ancient faith has been so largely supplanted by the faith of Islam that seventy-three per cent of the population is Muslim, is ample testimony to the unremitting zeal of the peaceful as well as the militant missionaries of the Crescent. But this widespread transformation was not the work of a short time. There was a period of suspended military operations for more than two and a half centuries, during which time Muslim conquerors did not trouble themselves about India. When at last a new commander of the armies of the Faithful appeared in India in A.D. 1001, it was not an Arab successor to Muhammad bin Qwāsīm, but a Turk, Mamud of Ghazni, who once more entered upon the task of the Muslim conquest of India.

¹ Al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ-ul-Buldān, tr. F. C. Murgotten, 432.

² Ibid., 432.

³ Ibid., 436.

The interesting thing at this point is the failure of the Arab conquest. Why did the expansionist Umayyad government at Damascus fail to follow up this advance, and carry it into the heart of the country, as had been done in the case of Persia and Afghānistān? Further, why was Sind ultimately abandoned as an Arabian province after the fall of the Umayyad dynasty? This seems very extraordinary considering the zeal and indomitable energy which characterized the spread of Islam throughout so many countries in the period of its early history. There were, however, certain internal developments taking place in the caliphate that undoubtedly affected the policy of expansion and made it all but impossible to continue to hold such a distant and inaccessible province. The historian, Elphinstone, presents these considerations, together with certain local difficulties with such convincing clearness that I cannot do better than repeat them :

In India there is a powerful priesthood, closely connected with the government, and deeply revered by their countrymen ; and a religion interwoven with the laws and manners of the people, which exercised an irresistible influence over their very thoughts. To this was joined a horror of change and a passive sort of courage, which is perhaps the best suited to allow time for an impetuous attack to spend its force. Even the divisions of the Hindus were in their favour : the downfall of one rājā only removed a rival prince who was next behind ; and the invader diminished his numbers, and got further from his resources, without being able to strike a blow which might bring his undertaking to a conclusion.

However these considerations may have weighed with the early invaders, they deserve the greatest attention from the inquirer, for it is principally to them that we must ascribe the slow progress of the Muḥammadan religion in India and the comparatively mild and tolerant form which it assumed in that country.

. . . there were other causes which tended to delay the progress of the Muḥammadans. The spirit of their government was gradually altered. Their chiefs, from fanatical missionaries, became politic sovereigns, more intent on the aggrandizement of their families than the propagation of their faith; and by the same degrees they altered from rude soldiers to magnificent and luxurious princes, who had other occupations besides war, and other pleasures as attractive as those of victory. Omar set out to his army at Jerusalem with his arms and provisions on the same camel with himself; and Othman extinguished his lamp when he had finished the labours of the day, that the public oil might not be expended on his enjoyments. Al-Mah̄dī, within a century from the last named caliph, loaded 500 camels with ice and snow; and the profusion of one day of the 'Abbāsides would have defrayed all the expenses of the first four caliphs. The translation of the Greek philosophers by al-Ma'mūn was an equally wide departure from the spirit which led to the story of the destruction of the library at Alexandria by Omar.¹

These are the reasons assigned for the sudden termination of the Arab conquests in the east. It was left for other nations to secure for Islam a permanent foothold in India, which has resulted in giving it the largest Muslim population of any country in the world.

LIMITED SUCCESS OF ALL CONQUESTS

From the time that Maḥmūd of Ghazni led his hosts out of the mountain fastnesses of Afghānistān down to the plains of India for trading, plunder, and slaughter of infidels, there was a rapid succession of invasions, conquests, and dynasties down to the middle of the nineteenth century. These all contributed to the widespread establishment of Islam in India. Maḥmūd in twelve or more successive raids between A.D. 1001 and 1027 ravaged and plundered the country as far as Gujarāt in western India, and as far as Kanauj to the east. But his only permanent settlement was at Lahore, where he left a governor, who administered the outlying province as best he could.

After Maḥmūd and his dynasty, the political power of Islam was extended far and wide. Following the occupation of Sind, Hindustan, Rajputana, Gujarāt, and Bundelkhand, the territories of Bihar and Bengal were the next to come under the influence of Islam, in the year A.D. 1202. This new conquest was made by the Muslim army under Muḥammad Bakhtyār Khaljī. By the beginning of the fourteenth century the Deccan had been invaded by 'Alā-ud-Dīn; and during the reigns of the Mughul emperors (A.D. 1556-1707), from Akbar to Aurangzib, the Muslim empire and influence attained its greatest extent and importance in the history of India.

¹ Elphinstone, History of India, 313.

When Maḥmūd entered the country, at the beginning of the eleventh century, Islam had scarcely been heard of beyond the confines of Sind, or beyond the western coast, where Muslim traders were wont to go. But during the seven centuries that elapsed between his coming and the death of Aurangzib, the Muslim empire had been flung across India from Quetta to the mouths of the Hughli, and from Ceylon to the snows of Kashmir, while the hearts of men had been so seeded down with the faith of Islam that India was henceforth destined to occupy a position of unique importance among the Muslim countries of the world.

Nevertheless, so far as the conversion of India as a whole is concerned, Islam signally failed. In no other country save China where her arms and missionaries have gone has she accomplished so little in proportion to the total population. India may have more Muslims than any other country, but India never became a Muslim country. In other countries, Egypt, North Africa, Asia Minor, Persia, Central Asia, which were overrun so completely in the early centuries of Muslim conquest, the victory of the Muslim faith was complete. Not so in India. In those countries, too, the conquest was made complete in a comparatively short space of time; but India put up a stubborn resistance to the Muslim propagaṇḍa even at the point of the sword, and all but successfully withstood the storm.

Even in the palmiest days of the Mughul emperors, and during the time of the empire's greatest extent under Aurangzib, the south of India never owed any but the most nominal allegiance to Muslim political control; and but few of the people in central and south India ever became converted to the Muslim faith. The largest Muslim state in India, Hyderābād, in the Deccan, has only ten per cent of its population made up of Muslims, while these are found chiefly in the cities, and are largely of foreign origin. In central India only four per cent of the population is Muslim; and in the Madras State only six per cent. Even in Rajputana we find a Muslim population of only nine per cent, although it is so near the imperial city of Delhi and the largely Muslim areas of Sind and the Punjab, while its chief city, Ajmīr, has been for centuries a renowned centre of Muslim activity, and the home and burial place of one of the most honoured of Muslim saints.¹ Uttar Pradesh, Bihar and Orissa tell a similar tale of failure to overcome the solid opposition of the Hindu ranks. In the former before Partition only fourteen per cent of the inhabitants were of the Muslim faith, and in the latter province they were only ten per cent. Islam predominated only in the North-Western Provinces, in Sind and in eastern Bengal. By far the greater part of India is solidly Hindu, in spite of the centuries of Muslim rule and invasion. The only conclusion, therefore, that one can reach as to why the attempt to Islamize India was thus only partially successful is that the Hindus were so well organized in their social and religious life under the domination of priests and caste that comparatively little could be effected toward the overthrow of their religion. Had they been as well organized in their political affairs, and had there been no outcaste groups to welcome Islam as a release from social bondage, it is safe to say that even a partial victory for Islam would not have been so easily won in the land of the Hindu.

ATTITUDE OF THE CALIPHS TO THE INVASION OF INDIA

That the early caliphs had their eyes fixed on India as a legitimate object of invasion, there can be no doubt. In fact, they considered such an invasion a solemn religious duty. The land, they knew, was under the sway of Hinduism and Buddhism, and war with such infidels and polytheists seemed a peculiarly urgent matter.

Apparently the only thing that kept the Caliph 'Umar from making such an invasion was the fact that the one feasible route for conveying troops to India was by sea, and 'Umar, having great dread of naval expeditions, forbade such an attempt being made. It is said that when ath-Thaqaḫī was governor of Oman he sent an army to Thāna, near Bombay, in the year A.D. 637. When the army returned safely, he wrote to the Caliph 'Umar informing him of this expedition.

¹ See p. 118.

The caliph sent back the following reply, expressing his great disapproval of this conduct: 'O brother Thaqīf, thou hast put a worm on the wood. By Allāh, I swear that if they (the army) had been smitten, I would exact from thy tribe, a like number.'¹ According to al-Balādhuri, 'Uthmān was the first caliph who planned to invade India. He went so far as to order an explorer to be sent to the frontiers of Sind by the southern land-route across the desert, in order to spy out the land and bring back information. Ḥākīm bin Jabala al-'Abdī was sent. On his return the caliph asked him about the country. He replied: 'Water is scarce, the fruits are poor, and the robbers are bold; if few troops are sent they will be slain, if many, they will starve.' So we are told that because of this unfavourable report the caliph 'abstained from sending any expedition there'.²

It was not until the caliphate of the Umayyad Walīd that these early designs for the extension of Muslim power to India were seriously considered. In the early part of the eighth century,³ and only seventy-nine years after the Prophet's death, Ḥajjāj bin Yūsuf, the governor of Baṣrah, at the head of the Persian Gulf, was able, through the successful generalship of his nephew, Muḥammad b. Quāsīm, to effect an occupation of Sind by the armies of Islam. This was the first step in the long series of Muslim conquests, which resulted in giving the Muslim religion a place second only to Hinduism in importance among the religions of India.

In considering the invasions of India it is well to have in mind the Muslim canon law in respect to invasions of non-Muslim countries. Behind them all was a religious as well as a political motive. Early in the development of Islam, jihād (holy war) was regarded as a religious duty of Muslim rulers. If practicable, they should fight until the whole world was under the rule of Islam. But if such continual conquest against infidels should be an impossibility, then the requirement of the law would be fulfilled if the sovereign made, or prepared to make, an expedition once a year. This was the canonical position of the early centuries; and one that strictly orthodox Muslims hold even to this day. In addition to the fanatical hatred of idolaters and polytheists which such doctrine so successfully produced, there was the desire for booty : gold, silver, precious gems, and slaves. All these the invaders knew such conquests would yield, since the princes of India were known to be fabulously rich.

¹ Al-Balādhurī, op. cit., 432.

² Ibid., 432.

³ See p. 4.

With these considerations in mind, let us examine the invasion of Sind in order to discover and set clearly before us the religious motives underlying the undertaking.

ḤAJJĀJ'S OBJECT IN INVADING SIND

One historian informs us that the reason Ḥajjāj invaded Sind was because an Arab ship had been seized at Debul, one of the seaport towns of that country, and on Rājā Dāhir's refusing to make restitution the governor of Baṣrah decided to send a punitive expedition to bring him to terms.¹ However, judging from the correspondence that took place between Ḥajjāj and Muḥammad, after the latter had reached Sind, it would appear that there had all along been other reasons as well that induced the invasion ; and that the presumptuous act of Rājā Dāhir, in refusing to make amends for the captured Arab ship, was only one among other considerations in the mind of the Baṣrah governor.

In an exchange of dispatches between the leader of the expeditionary force and the governor of Baṣrah, quoted by the author of the Chach-nāmah,² it becomes clear that there had been an understanding between Ḥajjāj and Muḥammad relative to the use of the expedition for the purpose of striking a blow at idolatry and polytheism, and of establishing Islam. In one of his dispatches Muḥammad is quoted as saying :

The nephew of Rājā Dāhir, his warriors and principal officers have been dispatched, and the infidels converted to Islam or destroyed. Instead of idol-temples, mosques and other places of worship have been erected, the *khutbah*³ is read, the call to prayers is raised, so that devotions are performed at stated hours. The taḥbir and praise to the Almighty God are offered every morning and evening.⁴

After receiving the above dispatch, which had been for-

¹ Al-Balādhurī, op. cit., 436.

² A history of Sind written in the early part of the eighth century A.D.

³ The khutbah is the Friday sermon preached in the mosque.

⁴ Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 164.

warded with the head of the Rājā, Ḥajjāj sent the following reply to his general :

Except that you give protection to all, great and small alike, make no difference between enemy and friend. God says, 'Give no quarter to infidels, but cut their throats. Then know that this is the command of the great God. You should not be too ready to grant protection, because it will prolong your work. After this give no quarter to any enemy except those who are of rank.'¹

RELIGIOUS OBJECTIVES OF LATER CONQUERORS AND RULERS

At the later periods, too, the religious motive of the invasions was well marked, at any rate up to the time of Bābur's coming in A.D. 1526. And even though, as in the case of Maḥmūd of Ghaznī, the desire for acquisition of some of the fabulous wealth of Hind seems to have amounted almost to a passion, yet the desire to establish Muslim rule in India was seldom if ever dissociated in the mind of the invader from the necessity of establishing the religion of Islam, and warring against the infidels. Of course this was to be expected, since, from the earliest times, religious domination was regarded as a function of the Muslim State, or conversely, political domination as one of the functions of the 'Church'.

Even Maḥmūd looked upon his numerous invasions of India as the waging of a holy war, though he did not seem to be as anxious to set up a Muslim government in the land as to harass the 'infidels', and secure as much booty from them as possible. Al-'Utbī, the historian of Maḥmūd, makes clear the religious objects of these raids in India.

'He demolished idol temples and established Islam. He captured . . . cities, killed the polluted wretches, destroying the idolatrous, and gratifying Muslims.' He then returned home and 'promulgated accounts of the victories obtained for Islam . . . and vowed that every year he would undertake a holy war against Hind'.²

Al-'Utbī shows also, in the remarks he makes on the success of the battle of Waihind, how Maḥmūd's contemporaries viewed his expeditions and how they rejoiced because of the glorious victories that were won for Islam. He writes :

The face of Islam was made resplendent by his exertions, the teeth of the true faith displayed themselves in their laughter, the breasts of religion were expanded, and the back of idolatry was broken.¹

¹ Ibid., 173.

² Ta'rikh-i-Yamini, E.D., II, 22.

Muḥammad Ghūrī in his conquests, almost two centuries after the famous Maḥmūd, still shows the same holy zeal in propagating his religion. Ḥasan Nizāmi says, 'He purged by his sword the land of Hind from the filth of infidelity and vice, and freed the whole of that country from the thorn of God-plurality and the impurity of idol-worship, and by his royal vigour and intrepidity left not one temple standing'.²

Iltutmish (A.D. 1210-1236) was likewise enthusiastic in his attempts to put Islam on a firm basis in his domain. Contemporary testimony to this fact is still found over the main arch leading into the Arhāi-Din-kā-Jhonprā at Ajmir.³ This clearly sets forth the conception of the early sultans of Delhi as to their mission to defend and spread the religion of Islam. The inscription carved in imperishable stone in Arabic as translated by Horovitz reads as follows :

This building was ordered by the Sultan, the high, the just, the great, the most exalted Shahanshah, the Lord of the necks of the people, the master of the kings of the Turks and Persians, the Shadow of God in the world, Shams al-Dunya wa al-Din, the help of Islam, and the Muslims, the crown of the kings and Sultans, the subduer of the unbelievers and the heretics, the subjugator of the evil-doers and the polytheists, the defender of Islam, the grandeur of the victorious government and the shining religion . . . Abu al-Muzaffar Iltutmish, the helper of the Caliph of God, the defender of the Prince of the Faithful.⁴

During the reign of 'Alā-ud-Din (1296-1316), Amīr Khusrū records in his Ta'rikh-i-'Alā'i that Mālik Kāfur, during his invasion of south India, explained to the Hindu Rai of Dhur Samund 'that he was sent with the object of converting him to Islam, or of making him a *dhimmi*⁵ and subject to the poll-tax, or of slaying him if neither of these terms were assented to'. But, we are told, 'later (the Rai) prostrated himself to the earth and rubbed the forehead of subjection on the ground when he saw resistance to the splendour of the sword of Islām over his head was useless.'⁶

¹ Ibid., 28.

² Tāj-ul-Ma'āthir, E.D., II, 217.

³ A mosque built from the spoils of ornate Hindu and Jain temples.

⁴ J. Horovitz, Epigraphia Indo-Moslemica, 30.

⁵ See p. 27 f.

⁶ Amīr Khusrū, E.D., III, 89.

Amīr Khusrū, recognized still as the foremost Muslim poet that India has ever produced, thus sings the praises of his contemporary 'Alā-ud-Dīn, and such tributes, even at the beginning of the fourteenth century, show no variation whatever from those bestowed on the earliest leaders of Muslim armies :

'Alā-ud-Dīn . . . who has been honoured by the chief of the 'Abbāsids, has destroyed the country of the sun-worshippers. When the arm of his fortune was raised, he became ruler of Hindustan. When he advanced from the capital of Karrā¹ the Hindus in alarm descended into the earth like ants. He departed towards the garden of Bihar to dye that soil with blood red as a tulip. He cleared the road to Ujjain of vile wretches, and created consternation in Bhilsan. When he effected his conquests in that country he drew out of the river the idols which had been concealed in it ;' and at Deogīr, 'he destroyed the temples and erected pulpits and arches for mosques'.²

The sultans were no doubt actuated by what they believed to be the highest motives. They were under a divine commission to establish good government, and put down practices that were contrary to the religion of Islam. In the *Futūḥāt-i-Fīrūz Shāhī*³ we see the picture of a ruler who believed he was obeying the dictates of his conscience and the commands of God, and was living up to the highest ideals he knew. The pious Sultan himself writes :

Thanks be to the merciful creator who gave His impulse for the maintenance of the laws of His religion, for the repression of heresy, the prevention of crime, and the prohibition of things forbidden . . . First, I would praise Him because when irreligion and sins opposed to the Law prevailed in Hindustan, and men's habits and dispositions were inclined towards them and were averse to the restraints of religion, He inspired me, His humble servant, with an earnest desire to repress irreligion and wickedness, so that I was able to labour diligently until with His blessing the vanities of the world and the things repugnant to religion were set aside and the true was distinguished from the false.⁴

But the ruler was not alone in feeling the need for carrying out the obligations of the faith, and waging war against the 'infidels' and 'polytheists', he was faithfully supported by the religious leaders of his time. In fact, it may be assumed that the Muslim people were all of one mind in respect to the aims and methods employed in the propagation of their faith.

¹ A town on the Jumna River near Allahabad.

² Amīr Khusrū, E.D., III, 543.

³ Memoirs, Fīrūz Shāh Tughluq, A.D. 1351-1388.

⁴ Fīrūz Shāh, E.D., III, 374 f.

This is shown with utter frankness, even as late as the time of the reign of Sher Shah. Although he was constructive and liberal in his governmental policies to a degree before unknown among the Muslim rulers of India, yet we are told that one of his learned associates, Shaykh Nizām, boldly recommended a jihād. 'For,' said he, 'there is nothing equal to a religious war against infidels. If you be slain you become a martyr, and if you live you become a ghāzī (hero).'¹

However, times had begun to change, and, although the learned might declare that a holy war was desirable on religious grounds, yet the emperors of Hindustan were more and more coming to realize that it could no longer be defended on political grounds. In place of the policy of antagonism, there was steadily growing up in the government a conviction that Muslims and Hindus must come into closer co-operation, and that there should be less bitterness and arrogance shown by the Muslim rulers to their Hindu subjects. During the later period of Muslim domination in India, between the years A.D. 1526 and 1800, only once, and then for a period of only half a century, was there any marked recurrence of the fanatical religious enthusiasm that characterized the early centuries of Muslim invasion and occupation. This was during the reign of Aurangzib, from A.D. 1659 to 1707.²

¹ 'Abbās Khān, E.D., IV, 408.

² It should be pointed out that the views expressed in this chapter do not find favour with some Muslims. There is a liberal school of thought which repudiates the usual interpretation placed upon the term jihād. It maintains that Islam is a religion of peace, that the word jihād has been perverted from its true meaning by interpreting it as 'holy war', whereas it means only 'striving' or 'making an effort' to spread the faith. Further, those who hold this view insist that the real objectives of the conquerors of India were not religious at all, but political. However, it must not be forgotten that the very essence of Islam is that it is both a religion and a system of government—a church-state. In Islam politics is not merely politics, and religion is not merely religion. Consequently, if one is to seek for an adequate interpretation of the political activities and military conquests of Muslim rulers, attention must always be paid to this fundamental conception of the Islamic State. While the religious motives and objectives of the conquerors and rulers should not be over-emphasized, on the other hand they must not be ignored altogether, nor lightly set aside by the judgment that such men were inspired by considerations of conquest and political power alone. While realizing the difficulties involved, I have nevertheless sought to hold the balance as evenly as possible between these two points of view.

CHAPTER II

THE METHODS OF THE CONQUERORS

It is beyond dispute that one of the characteristics of the Muslim conquest of India was that of a militant propaganda, with the purpose of establishing not only Muslim government over the people, but the Muslim faith as well. This was all a part of the system and policy of that day. It never occurred to the invaders that Islam could be established as a religion independent of the existence of the Muslim State, which is being proclaimed as a possibility in the more advanced circles of Muslim leadership to-day. Nevertheless, there were traders, religious devotees and preachers who came to realize the necessity, if not the ultimate desirability, of establishing the religion of Islam in India entirely apart from the assistance of the Islamic State. It will be necessary, therefore, to consider the religious history of Islam in India from these two points of view. However, it must always be remembered, that whatever may have been the successes of the peaceful penetration methods of preachers and traders in adding to the Muslim population, yet the prestige and political influence and real power that developed in Indian Islam was due rather to the influence and policies of the Muslim rulers who determined its destiny. They gave protection to the learned men from Persia and Arabia. They were the patrons of Muslim arts and sciences, and it was they who gave Islam a place of importance in the land. Even today the descendants of these former ruling chiefs and their associates at the royal court and in the army are to be found among the leaders of the Muslim community of Pakistan and India. Bābur, Akbar, Aurangzīb, and their courtiers are gone; but their descendants largely direct the destinies of the more than one hundred million Muslims in India and Pakistan.

INTOLERANCE

Throughout the whole period of Muslim contact with India the attitude of Muslim rulers to their Hindu subjects and their religion has been very largely one of intolerance or indifference. True there was a period of conciliation and appreciation under Akbar, but this period was short-lived and Akbar was generally regarded by Muslims as a heretic. Periods of tolerance seem to have been associated in the minds of the Hindus with weakness and inability to rule. As a result, whenever the opportunity came they rose in rebellion, and upset what had been accomplished by a former strict and capable ruler. The early Muslim conquerors and rulers seldom took a sympathetic interest in their Hindu subjects from a purely humanitarian or cultural point of view. Their whole object, apparently, was the religious one of either converting the infidels, or of 'sending them to hell with the sword'. If they submitted at all, they were subjected to looting and the imposition of the jizyah (poll-tax). In order, therefore, that we may understand what the conditions were which the conquering Muslim armies imposed on the conquered, we shall take only the testimony of Muslim historians, who deal with the events and policies of those who sought to establish the Muslim religion in India, through the agency of political and military power.

It will clarify the issue somewhat if we consider the ruling ideas of the leaders of Islam in their broadest aspects. The whole period of Muslim contact with India falls into two divisions. The first ends roughly with the close of the fifteenth century; the second begins with the founding of the Mughul Empire by Bābur at the beginning of the sixteenth century. During the first period, covering eight centuries, there seems to have existed in the minds of the invaders, their resident viceroys, and the independent kings the hope that they would be able as thoroughly to Islamize the country as the armies of the caliphs had been able to do in Persia and western lands.

With the coming of Bābur and the founding of the Mughul Empire this hope seems to have been very largely set aside for the more practical and reasonable policy of government for the good of all the people. The intolerant spirit, begotten of the older Arab influence, gave place to a more kindly spirit of tolerance and appreciation of the indomitable Hindus, the people of the country. In this period even the Afghan, Sher Shāh (A.D. 1539-1545), in his interregnum, showed that a new spirit had been awakened ; and Akbar carried it to the fullest extent of realization. Aurangzīb alone, of all the rulers of this second period, showed any determination to revive the hope of the earlier period for the Islamization of India, but even he was forced to recognize the limitations of the task.

MILITANT METHODS

A spirit of intolerance and wild fanatical zeal marked the conquerors who came bearing the message of Islam during the first eight centuries of Muslim contact with India (A.D. 711-1526). The Arab invasion under Muḥammad bin Quāsim, in the year A.D. 711, was ostensibly a punitive expedition only.¹ It was entirely successful from the military point of view, and, having defeated the forces of the Rājā and taken possession of the citadel of Debul,² he next turned his attention to the religious problem that confronted him.

Muḥammad was the product of his age. He was filled with the zeal and enthusiasm that marked the early missionaries of the Muslim ' church militant '. Scarce twenty years of age, he had been born while the conquests of the Crescent were moving steadily east, west and north. All through the world in which he moved men talked of these brilliant victories for Allāh. Muslim dominion had been extended from the heart of Arabia to the Atlantic shores of North Africa on the west and to the Hindu Kush on the east. Behind this mighty sweep of armies lay the inspiring magic of the word jihād. The underlying philosophy of it, the divine sanction for it, and rules for the treatment of infidels all seem cruelly intolerant to us to-day ; but they were considered just and reasonable by those who made them their philosophy and way of life.

As we saw in the last chapter, canon law in Islam holds that it is incumbent on a Muslim ruler to fight to extend the rule of Islam until the whole world shall have been brought under its sway. The world is divided into two camps, dār-ul-Islām (abode of Islam), and dār-ul-Ḥarb (abode of War). All countries come under one category or the other. Technically, it is the duty of the Muslim ruler, who is capable of doing so, to transform dār-ul-Harb into dār-ul-Islām. There are, however, certain principles for the waging of jihād which must be kept in mind, for it must not be assumed that either Muḥammad or his successors were acting toward their Hindu antagonists other than in accordance with Muslim canon law. When these rules are stated, the actions of the Muslim conquerors become intelligible, however regrettable they may seem.

¹ See p. 9.

² An ancient seaport of Sind at the mouth of the Indus.

The rule is that the people against whom the jihād is directed must first be invited to embrace Islam. If they refuse they have two alternatives: (1) to submit to Muslim rule, become dhimmīs, and pay the jizyah (poll-tax) and kharāj (land-tax), or (2) fight. If they embrace Islam they forthwith become citizens of the Muslim State, with all the rights and privileges pertaining thereto. If they submit and become dhimmīs, though their lives, families, property, and religious practices are assured them, yet they occupy a definitely inferior status. They are not really citizens, and are regarded only as wards of the State. On the other hand, if they fight, they and their families may be led into slavery, and all their property taken as booty, one-fifth of which goes to the sovereign and four-fifths to the army.¹ Further it must be remembered that the status of dhimmi may be offered only to those people who have a Scripture (ahl-ul-Kitāb). These are understood to be Jews, Christians, Magians, and Sabeans. In the case of pagans, idolaters, polytheists, who are not regarded as ahl-ul-Kitāb and have no Scriptures, it is held that for them there is a choice only between Islam or death. All of which is based on the verse, Qur'ān, ix. 29: '... Fight them, who have been given a Scripture, that believe not in God and the last day, and who hold not as forbidden what God and His apostle have forbidden, and do not profess the true religion, until they pay the jizyah in person in subjection.'²

It should be noted, as we proceed, the extent to which the Muslim conquerors deviated from the strict application of the law of jihād in dealing with the Hindus who were not ahl-ul-Kitāb, and were clearly beyond the rule permitting them to occupy the status of dhimmīs. The alternative for them would have been Islam or death. But the application of this rule was of necessity relaxed. The Muslim armies were too small to enforce the rule extensively. They were far from the base of reinforcements, the numbers of the people opposing them were too vast ; and, lastly, it would have been fatal to the welfare of the troops themselves, who were dependent on the services of the agriculturists, artisans and menials of the country to provide them with the necessary means of existence. There was no alternative left to the invaders, therefore, but to make an exception to the rule. It will be noted, however, that, in general, the early conquerors usually went as far as possible in applying the law of jihād, and only stopped when it was not practicable to do more. In later times, of course, extreme tolerance toward Hindus became a policy of state.

¹ E.I., art. 'Jihad'.

² E.I., art. 'Jizyah'.

Muḥammad b. Quāsim's first act of religious zeal was forcibly to circumcise the Brāhmaṇs of the captured city of Debul ; but, on discovering that they objected to this sort of conversion, he then proceeded to put all above the age of seventeen to death, and to order all others, with women and children, to be led into slavery. The temple of the Hindus was looted, and the rich booty was divided equally among the the soldiers, after one-fifth, the legal portion for the government, had been set aside. But Muḥammad did not continue to inflict the same acts of cruelty on every city he conquered. After the first flush of victory was over, he seems to have proceeded with more care and caution in the treatment of the inhabitants. Henceforth on approaching a city of the infidels he offered them the alternative of embracing Islam or of becoming dhimmīs and paying jizyah, which was established by the Caliph 'Umar as a head tax for the protection offered by the Muslim State to those of other religions. Those who neither became Muslims nor submitted to the jizyah Muḥammad regarded as enemies (ḥarbīs), against whom it was lawful to wage war until they were killed or conquered. It is said that in two of the cities of Sind during this invasion no less than six thousand soldiers in each were put to the sword, while the families of the soldiers were taken as slaves. The usual practice seems to have been to exempt the merchants and artisans, farmers and menials from violence of any sort, and from slavery, though of course they were obliged to accept the inferior status of dhimmīs and pay the jizyah.

While these were the principles of action, let us examine further some of the concrete examples of the intolerant spirit that marked the early centuries, for, painful as such reading is, it is none the less necessary to enable us to understand many subsequent events. Al-Balādhuri tells us that at the capture of Multān, after the surrender of the place, the soldiers were massacred, 'but the children and priests to the number of six thousand were made prisoners.'¹ At Kiraj after the surrender Muḥāmmad slew some and the rest he reduced to slavery.² Another authority says that after the people of Brāhmanābad had held out for six months they finally surrendered to him. He then put all the soldiers to death and took their dependents prisoners. All captives up to thirty years of age were made slaves, and a price put on them, but 'every one who bowed down his head and sued for protection was released'.³

Though the early Arab invasion was marked by great cruelty and intolerance, yet there were some acts of clemency that are deserving notice. The city of Alrūr, which Muḥāmmad besieged for several months, finally surrendered to him on condition that he should spare the lives of the inhabitants and not touch the temples. This he conceded, saying, 'The idol temples shall be unto us like as the churches of the Christians, the synagogues of the Jews, and the temples of the Magians.'⁴ On one occasion he seems to have been in a quandary as to what to do, for, after he had destroyed the temples, the people submitted and requested that they should be allowed to rebuild them and carry on their former worship. Accordingly he referred the matter to the governor at Baṣrah, and received the reply, that :

As the people of the towns in question had paid tribute, they were entitled to all the privileges of subjects ; that they should be allowed to rebuild their temples and perform their rites ; that the land and money of the Brāhmins should be restored ; and that the three per cent on the revenue, which had been allowed to them by the Hindu government, should be continued by the Mussulman.⁵

At a later date we learn that the Caliph 'Umar bin 'Abd-ul-'Azīz sent letters to the princes of Hind, inviting them to

¹ Al-Balādhurī, op. cit., 440.

² Ibid., 440.

³ Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 179.

⁴ Al-Balādhurī, op. cit., 439.

⁵ Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 186.

become Muslims, and using his powers of persuasion upon them. It is recorded that, as they had already heard of his promises, character, and creed, so Jaishiya and other princes turned Muslims and took Arab names.¹

While the Muslim invasion of Sind did not result in a permanent occupation, it did clearly foreshadow the militant methods of the Muslim conquerors, which were to be prosecuted with such unrelenting vigour from the time of the coming of Maḥmūd of Ghaznī in A.D. 1001 down to the appearance of the Mughuls in A.D. 1526. Though the caliphate was forced to withdraw its direct control from the distant province of Sind by the middle of the ninth century, Islam did not depart. The history of the intervening centuries is obscure. It seems probable, however, that members of the original army of occupation, and colonists who had been given land and had married women of the country, continued to keep the embers of the faith glowing. Added to these were some of the original converts, who had been given positions in the army and government. These also did their part to keep the new faith alive until the coming of another conqueror, who with his successors saw the practical accomplishment of the conversion of the Hindus of the Indus valley. To-day there are less than ten per cent of the inhabitants of Sind who have not accepted the faith of Islam.²

SYSTEMATIC SLAUGHTER, DESTRUCTION, AND LOOTING

Maḥmūd of Ghaznī from the first adopted those plans that would strike terror to the hearts of the people of India. Al-'Utbi illustrates this with the graphic picture which he draws of the treatment meted out to Rājā Jaipāl after his defeat in A.D. 1001. 'Jaipal was ordered to be paraded about so that his sons and chieftains might see him in that condition of shame, bonds and disgrace; and that the fear of Islam might fly abroad through the country of the infidels.'³

The effect of such attempts to produce fear is shown in the

¹ Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 124; al-Balādhurī, op. cit., 441.

² Census of Pākistān, 1951—Muslims in Sind are 90.8% of population.

³ Al-'Utbi, E.D., II, 27.

abject surrender of Hardat and his men in the Doāb, and their voluntary acceptance of Islam, concerning which the author of Ta'rīkh-i-Yamīnī writes thus :

When Hardat heard of this invasion by the protected warriors of God who advanced like the waves of the sea, with angels around them on all sides, he became greatly agitated, his steps trembled, and he feared for his life, which was forfeited under the law of God. So he reflected that his safety would best be secured by conforming to the religion of Islam, since God's sword was drawn from the scabbard, and the whip of punishment was uplifted. He came forth, therefore, with ten thousand men, who all proclaimed their anxiety for conversion, and their rejection of idols.¹

At Mathura we are told that Maḥmūd was greatly impressed by the beauty and size of the buildings ; but in spite of this fact Al-'Utbī says that he ' gave orders that all the temples should be burnt with naphtha and fire, and levelled to the ground ' .²

The slaughtering of ' infidels ' seemed to be one thing that gave Maḥmūd particular pleasure. In one attack on Chand Rai, in A.D. 1019, ' many infidels were slain or taken prisoners, and the Muslims paid no regard to booty until they had satiated themselves with the slaughter of the infidels and worshippers of sun and fire ' . The historian naïvely adds that the elephants of the Hindu armies ' came to Maḥmūd of their own accord, leaving idols, preferring the service of the religion of Islam ! ' ³

Not infrequently the slaughter of the enemy gave a great set-back to the indigenous culture of the Hindus, as in the conquest of Bihār by Muḥammad Bakhtyār Khaljī. When he took a certain place, the Ṭabaqāt-i-Nāṣirī informs us that ' great plunder fell into the hands of the victors. Most of the inhabitants were Brāhmans with shaven heads. They were put to death. Large numbers of books were found . . . but no one could explain their contents, as all the men had been killed. The whole fort and city being a place of study.'⁴

Of the destruction of temples and the desecration of idols we have an abundance of evidence. Muḥammad b. Quāsim carried out his plan of destruction systematically in Sind, as we have seen ; but he made an exception of the famous

¹ Al-'Utbī, E.D., II, 42.

² Ibid., 45.

³ Ibid., 49.

⁴ Minhāj-as-Sirāj, Ṭabaqāt-i-Nāṣirī, E.D., II, 306.

temple at Multān for purposes of revenue, as this temple was a place of resort for pilgrims, who made large gifts to the idol. Nevertheless, while he thus satisfied his avarice by letting the temple stand, he gave vent to his malignity by having a piece of cow's flesh tied around the neck of the idol.¹

Minhāj-as-Sirāj² further tells how Maḥmūd became widely known for having destroyed as many as a thousand temples, and of his great feat in destroying the temple of Somnāth and carrying off its idol, which he asserts was broken into four parts. 'One part he deposited in the Jāmi' Masjid of Ghaznī, one he placed at the entrance of the royal palace, the third he sent to Mecca, and the fourth to Medina.'³

Muḥammad Ghūrī, one of the enthusiastic successors of Maḥmūd, in his conquest of Ajmīr 'destroyed pillars and foundations of the idol temples, and built in their stead mosques and colleges, and the precepts of Islam and the customs of the law were divulged and established'.⁴ At Delhi, 'the city and its vicinity were freed from idols and idol worship, and in the sanctuaries of the images of the gods mosques were raised by the worshippers of the one God'.⁵

Quṭb-ud-Dīn Aybak also is said to have destroyed nearly a thousand temples, and then raised mosques on their foundations. The same author states that he built the Jāmi' Masjid, at Delhi, 'and adorned it with the stones and gold obtained from the temples which had been demolished by elephants, and covered it with inscriptions (from the Qur'ān) containing the divine commands'.⁶ We have further evidence of this borrowing process having been systematically employed from the inscription extant over the eastern gateway of this same mosque at Delhi, which relates that the materials of twenty-seven idol temples were used in its construction.⁷

'Alā-ud-Dīn, in his zeal to build a second minār to the Jāmi' Masjid, to rival the one built by Quṭb-ud-Dīn, is said by Amīr Khusrū not only to have dug stones out of the hills, but to have demolished temples of the infidels to furnish a supply.⁸ In his conquests of south India the destruction of

¹ History of India., E.D., I, 470.

² A qādi and historian of Delhi.

³ Minhāj-as-Sirāj, E.D., II, 270.

⁵ Ibid., 217.

⁶ Ibid.

⁷ J. Horovitz, op. cit., 13.

He died about A.D. 1260.

⁴ Hasan Niẓāmī, E.D., II, 215.

⁸ Amīr Khusrū, E.D., III, 70.

temples was carried out by 'Alā-ud-Dīn as systematically as it had been in the north by his predecessors.

The Sultan Fīrūz Shāh, in his Futūhāt, graphically relates how he treated Hindus who had dared to build new temples. When they did this 'in the city (Delhi) and the environs, in opposition to the Law of the Prophet, which declares that such are not to be tolerated, under Divine guidance I destroyed these edifices, I killed those leaders of infidelity and punished the others with stripes, until this abuse was entirely abolished, . . . and where infidels and idolaters worshipped idols, Mussulmans now by God's mercy perform their devotions to the true God'.¹

With the destruction of the temples also went the destruction of the implements of worship, and no doubt very often the sacred books. Fīrūz Shāh takes special pains to note how he made his destruction complete: 'The new temple was destroyed, and I also ordered that the infidel books, the idols, and the vessels used in their worship should all be burnt.'²

Even in the reign of Shāh Jahān we read of the destruction of temples that the Hindus had started to rebuild, and the account of this direct attack on the piety of the Hindus is thus solemnly recorded in the Bādshāh-nāmah:

'It had been brought to the notice of His Majesty,' says the historian, 'that during the late reign (of Akbar) many idol temples had been begun but remained unfinished at Benares, the great stronghold of infidelity. The infidels were now desirous of completing them. His Majesty, the defender of the faith, gave orders that at Benares and throughout all his dominions in every place all temples that had been begun should be cast down. It was reported from the province of Allahabad that seventy-six temples had been destroyed in the district of Benares.'³

It was left to Aurangzīb, to make a final attempt to overthrow idolatry. The author of Ma'āthir-i-Ālamgīrī, dilates upon his efforts to put down Hindu teaching, and his destruction of temples as follows. In April, A.D. 1669, Aurangzīb learned:

that in the provinces of Thatta, Multan and Benares, but especially in the latter, foolish Brāhmans were in the habit of expounding frivolous books in their schools, and that learners, Muslims as well as Hindus, went there from long distances. . . . The 'Director of the Faith' consequently issued orders to all the governors of provinces to destroy with a willing hand the schools and temples of the infidels; and they were enjoined to put an entire stop to the teaching and practising of idolatrous worship. . . . Later it was reported to his religious Majesty that the government officers had destroyed the temple of Bishnath at Benares.¹

¹ Fīrūz Shāh, E.D., III, 380.

² Ibid., 381.

³ 'Abd-ul-Hamīd Lāhorī, E.D., VII, 36.

This was not all. Perhaps the most vigorous attempt made by Aurangzib, and one that showed his fanatical attitude toward Hinduism more than any other single act, was his treatment of the sacred city of Mathura. The same writer tells how, in December, A.D. 1669, 'this justice-loving monarch' ordered the destruction of the Hindu temple of Mathura, known as Dehra Kesū Rai, and 'soon that stronghold of infidelity was levelled to the ground'. Then follows a glorification of the piety of the emperor, and his mighty works for the cause of Islam, in these words :

On the same spot was laid at great expense the foundation of a vast mosque. . . . Glory be to God who has given us the faith of Islam, that in this reign of the destroyer of false gods, an undertaking so difficult of accomplishment has been brought to a successful termination ! This vigorous support given to the true faith was a severe blow to the arrogance of the Rājās, and like idols they turned their faces awestruck to the wall. The richly jewelled idols taken from the pagan temples were transferred to Agra, and there placed beneath the steps leading to the Nawab Begam Sahib' mosque, in order that they might ever be pressed under foot by the true believers. Muttra changed its name to Islamabad.²

Ten years later, we read that Khān Jāhan Bāhadūr arrived from Jodhpur, bringing several cartloads of idols taken from Hindu temples that had been razed, and that His Majesty proceeded to Chitor on the first of the month Safar of that year, and 'temples to the number of sixty-three were here demolished'. Abū Turāb, who had been commissioned to effect the destruction of temples at Amber, reported inter alia that 'three score and six of these edifices had been levelled with the ground'.³

But temples were not always destroyed by the conquerors. In some cases where the buildings were at all suitable they were converted into mosques, and enlarged and modified to such an extent that one would not at the present time easily suspect that such a transformation had been made. Two such mosques I have seen, one at Amroha, where the chain that supported the bell of the original Hindu temple is still to be found hanging from the ceiling. The other, in Sambhal,¹ also plainly reveals some of the original structure of the Hindu temple, so well known as the traditional spot where the tenth or Nishkalank Avatār (Spotless Incarnation) of Vishnu will one day appear. Still, the general practice in dealing with temples, if they were touched at all, was to destroy them rather than to convert them into mosques.

¹ Muḥammad Sāqi, E.D., VII, 184.

² Ibid., 184, 185.

³ Ibid., 187, 188.

Not only was slaughter of the infidels and the destruction of their temples resorted to in the earlier period of Islam's contact with India, but, as we have seen, many of the vanquished were led into slavery. The dividing up of booty was one of the special attractions to the leaders as well as to the common soldiers in these expeditions. Maḥmūd seems to have made the slaughter of infidels, the destruction of their temples, the capturing of slaves, and the plundering of the wealth of the people, particularly of the temples and the priests, the main object of his raids. On the occasion of his first raid he is said to have taken much booty; and half a million Hindus, 'beautiful men and women,' were reduced to slavery and taken back to Ghaznī!²

When he later took Kanauj, in A.D. 1017, he took so much booty and so many prisoners that 'the fingers of those who counted them would have tired'.³ The same authority describes how common Indian slaves had become in Ghaznī and Central Asia after the campaign of A.D. 1019.

The number of prisoners may be conceived from the fact that each was sold for from two to ten dirhams.⁴ These were afterwards taken to Ghaznī, and merchants came from far distant cities to purchase them; . . . and the fair and the dark, the rich and the poor were commingled in one common slavery.⁵

In the year A.D. 1202, when Quṭb-ud-Dīn captured Kalinjar, after the temples had been converted into mosques, and 'the very name of idolatry was annihilated, fifty thousand

¹ Amroha and Sambhal are both in the Moradabad District, U.P.

² Al-'Utbi, E.D., II, 26.

³ Ibid., 45.

⁴ A dirham was worth about five pence.

⁵ Ibid., 49.

men came under the collar of slavery and the plain became black as pitch with Hindus'.¹

Fortunately, after the thirteenth century we find practically no references to the practice of reducing Hindus to slavery; though slavery did not by any means die out, and from Shams-i-Sirāj 'Afif we learn that there were so many royal slaves in the reign of Fīrūz Shāh (A.D. 1351-1388), that, in the city of Delhi and in the various fiefs, there were estimated to be one hundred and eighty thousand slaves. Slavery thus became an established institution.

Some of the slaves spent their time in reading and committing to memory the Holy Book, others in religious studies, others in copying books. Some . . . went on pilgrimage to Mecca. Some were placed under tradesmen and were taught mechanical arts, so that about twelve thousand slaves became artisans of various kinds. Forty thousand every day were ready to attend as guards in the Sultan's equipage or at the palace.

There was a separate treasury for the payment of the allowance of the slaves, and a distinct department for administering their affairs.²

DHIMMĪS

During the long period of Muslim rule in India, the government regarded the people as in three classes with reference to the faith. First of all, of course there were the Muslims, who alone were technically citizens and stood first in all rights, honours, and privileges; secondly, there were the dhimmīs, or unbelievers who had submitted to the rule of Islam and had agreed to pay the jizyah (poll-tax), that, according to the law of Islam, must be levied on all unbelievers; thirdly, there were the ḥarbīs, or those who had not yet submitted to the government and were under the process of subjection. Once a territory had been subjugated, as in the case of Sind, the warriors were either forcibly converted to Islam or killed, their wives and children made slaves, and the temples destroyed, it was judged expedient to spare the lives of the non-combatant classes, and to fix a tax upon them. Of course, all who became Muslims were exempt from slavery and the jizyah, but, as for the others, it was a religious duty that the jizyah be imposed, in addition to the kharaaj, which was levied on the land and other property.

¹ Hasan Nizamī, E.D., II, 231.

² Ta'rikh-i-Fīrūz Shāhi, E.D., III, 341.

Muḥammad b. Quāsim, during the first occupation of Sind (A.D. 711), placed those who did not embrace Islam in three grades for the purposes of taxation; in the first grade each was to pay silver equal to forty-eight dirhams in weight;¹ the second grade paid twenty-four dirhams; and the third, and lowest, grade paid twelve dirhams. Those who agreed to pay the tribute and kept their ancestral faith were also permitted to keep their property.²

All the successive invaders and rulers of India, after Muḥammad b. Quāsim, until the time of Akbar, thought of nothing else than applying the law of the jizyah and all other laws, in respect of the treatment of dhimmīs, which, so far as the records go, must have been anything but conducive to approval and respect for the government and religion of the invaders. Maḥmūd levied such tribute during his invasions, and no doubt collected it as often as he made his frequent raids. There is ample evidence to prove that the Hindus very naturally evaded paying the hated tax as often as they could get out of it. During the earlier invasion we are told that Muḥammad b. Quāsim appointed the Brāhmins to be the collectors of the jizyah.³

This was a matter of necessity, no doubt, because he had not enough men of his own faith to whom he could entrust this work. One can believe that such Brāhmins would be well hated by their fellow countrymen, as the publicans were despised by the Jews in the days of Christ. The Brāhmins, moreover, early gained a favoured position with the conquerors, possibly because of this practice of appointing them as collectors of the poll-tax. During the reign of Fīrūz Shāh (A.D. 1351-1388) it was decided that, although the jizyah had never been levied on the Brāhmins of Delhi in the former reigns, it was unwise to continue this liberal policy. After consultation with his counsellors, it was agreed that they should no longer be excused, since, it was pointed out, they 'were the very keys of the chamber of idolatry, and the infidels were dependent on them'. The Brāhmins, in turn,

¹ A dirham weight was equal to about 3 grammes.

² Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 182.

³ Ibid., E.D., I, 184.

objected, but finally they were compelled to pay, though they gained something for their trouble, as the amount was reduced below the rates commonly applied.¹

The imposition of such a special tax, based on the idea of subjection and inferiority, was sufficient in itself either to make the Hindus the avowed enemies of Islam, or to drive some weaker souls to the point of embracing Islam to escape the tax. However that may have been, we learn from a historian of the reign of 'Alā-ud-Dīn what the orthodox attitude was in those early times with respect to the treatment of dhimmis. Although the interpretation of the law of the jizyah as given to the Sultan by the quāḍī (judge) may never have been literally carried out, and may only have served, as Sir T. W. Arnold suggests, as a counsel of perfection, yet so much is revealed in this statement of the religious attitude of those times that we cannot lightly pass it by.

The Sultan 'Alā-ud-Dīn on one occasion asked a quāḍī 'How are Hindus designated in the law—as payers of tribute or givers of tribute?' The answer was given:

They are called payers of tribute, and when the revenue officer demands silver from them, they should without question, and with all humility and respect, tender gold. If the officer throws dirt in their mouths, they must without reluctance open their mouths wide to receive it. . . . The due subordination of the dhimmi is exhibited in this humble payment, and by this throwing of dirt into their mouths. The glorification of Islam is a duty, and contempt for religion is vain. God holds them in contempt, for he says, 'Keep them in subjection.' To keep the Hindus in abasement is especially a religious duty, because they are the most inveterate enemies of the Prophet, and because the Prophet has commanded us to slay them, plunder them, and make them captive, saying, 'Convert them to Islam or kill them, enslave them, and spoil their wealth and property.' No doctor but the great doctor (Ḥanīfah), to whose school we belong, has assented to the imposition of jizyah on Hindus; doctors of other schools allow no other alternative but 'Death or Islam'.²

The amount of tax imposed evidently varied with the circumstances and the necessity of the case, sometimes in utter disregard of the limits of the law of Islam. In the days of 'Alā-ud-Dīn, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, the Hindus had in certain parts given the Sultan much trouble.

¹ Ta'rikh-i-Firūz Shāhi, E.D., III, 365.

² Ḍiyā-ud-Dīn Baranī, E.D., III, 184.

So he determined to impose such taxes on them that they would be prevented from rising in rebellion. 'The Hindu was to be left unable to keep a horse to ride on, to carry arms, to wear fine clothes, or to enjoy any of the luxuries of life.' These edicts, says the historian of the period, 'were so strictly carried out that the chaukidhārs and khuts and muquaddims were not able to ride on horseback, to find weapons, to get fine clothes, or to indulge in betel! . . . No Hindu could hold up his head. . . . Blows, confinement in the stocks, imprisonment and chains were all employed to enforce payment.'¹

The payment of the jizyah by the Hindus continued throughout the dominions of the sultans, emperors, and kings in various parts of India with more or less regularity, though often the law was in force in theory only; since it depended entirely on the ability of the sovereign to enforce his demands. But, finally, it was abolished throughout the Mughul Empire in the ninth year of the enlightened Akbar's reign (A.D. 1665), after it had been accepted as a fundamental part of Muslim governmental policy in India for a period of more than eight centuries. It ceased to be a part of the policy of Muslim rule until the reign of Aurangzib, who, because of his adherence to the tenets of orthodoxy, issued 'royal orders to collect the revenues of each province according to the Moslem law'.² This was the last serious effort made to impose the jizyah on Hindus, and from the beginning of the eighteenth century, after the death of the Emperor Aurangazib and the rise of the Maratha power, the tax gradually fell into disuse, until finally the Hindus were completely freed from it.

FORCED CONVERSIONS

Of all the measures taken by the Muslim rulers in India to establish Islam as the religion of the country, none met with more bitter resentment on the part of the Hindus than the various means that were employed to bring about the conversion of their people to the Muslim faith. The echoes of this policy have not even yet died away, though much more than a century has passed since the last forced conversions under royal sanction took place.

¹ Ḍiyā-ud-Dīn Baranī, E.D., III, 182, 183.

² Bakhtāwar Khān, E.D., VII, 160.

As we have already seen, Muhammad b. Quāsim began his invasion of India in A.D. 711 by forcibly circumcising the Brāhmans of Debul, and when they objected to this treatment he put all of the males over seventeen to death. As he advanced eastward and took their cities, we are told that some of the people embraced Islam rather than die, and we may be sure that all who were made slaves were compelled to embrace the religion of the masters to whom they were allotted. It was the custom also for the invaders to take wives from the Hindus, and, among many instances, we are told that Muhammad b. Quāsim sent two daughters of the Rājā Dāhir of Sind to Baṣrah to enter the harem of the governor Ḥajjāj. In fact, these early Arab invaders, who came to India without their families, may be pictured, as Elliot says, 'in several military colonies, seeking solace for their lost homes in the arms of native women of the country, and leaving their lands and plunder to be inherited by their Sindo-Arab- descendants'. The point is that these alliances, forced, as they were, resulted in conversion to Islam.¹

We do not know how successful the early Arab invaders were in bringing about conversions of the Hindus by these methods. It is more than likely that they confined operations of this sort chiefly to the cities and towns they captured; and it was not until a much later period that the bulk of the inhabitants of Sind became Muslim. However, with the first invasion of India began the use of the prerogative of Islam, as conceived of by the early propagandists, in bringing about conversion of ḥarbīs and dhimmīs by the use of force.

Though forced conversions were not the only means of increasing the numbers of the faithful, and although the supposition is wrong that Islam in India was propagated entirely by the sword, even in the early days, yet the fact remains that the use of force in some form or other has always been recognized, by the Muslim rulers of India, and by the orthodox lawyers of Islam, as being a proper and lawful method of propagating the faith of the Prophet. It is impossible, therefore, either to ignore or lightly pass over this.

¹ E.D., History of India, I, 464.

phase of the religious history of Islam in India, though we may well rejoice that the day of greater liberality and a more generous interpretation of the precepts of Islam has dawned.

Such invaders as Maḥmūd and Tīmūr seem to have been more concerned with iconoclasm, the collection of booty, the enslaving of captives, and the sending of infidels to hell with the 'proselytizing sword' than they were with the conversion of them even by means of force. But when rulers were permanently established, the winning of converts became a matter of supreme urgency. It was a part of the State policy to establish Islam as the religion of the whole land.

Quṭb-ud-Dīn, whose reputation for destroying temples was almost as great as that of Maḥmūd, in the latter part of the twelfth century and early years of the thirteenth, must have frequently resorted to force as an incentive to conversion. One instance may be noted: when he approached Koil (Aligarh) in A.D. 1194, 'those of the garrison who were wise and acute were converted to Islam, but the others were slain with the sword'.¹

Further examples of extreme measures employed to effect a change of faith are all too numerous. One pathetic case is mentioned in the time of the reign of Firūz Shāh (A.D. 1351-1388). An old Brāhman of Delhi had been accused of worshipping idols in his house, and of even leading Muslim women to become infidels. He was sent for and his case placed before 'the judges, doctors, elders and lawyers. Their reply was that the provisions of the law were clear. The Brāhman must either become a Muslim or be burned. The true faith was declared to him and the right course pointed out, but he refused to accept it.' Consequently he was burned by the order of the Sultan, and the commentator adds, 'Behold the Sultan's strict adherence to law and rectitude, how he would not deviate in the least from its decrees.'²

As late as the middle of the eighteenth century, we learn of a case of forced conversions after the crushing defeat of Hindu arms near Delhi by Ahmad Shāh Abdālī. 'About ninety thousand persons, male and female, were taken prisoners, and obtained eternal happiness by embracing the Muslim faith. Indeed, never was such a splendid victory achieved from the time of Amīr Maḥmūd Sabuktigīn to the present day by any of the Sultans.¹

¹ Hasan Nizāmī, E.D., II, 222.

² Shams-i-Sirāj 'Afif, E.D. III, 365.

In his interesting study, The Preaching of Islam, Sir T. W. Arnold shows to what lengths rulers could go in their zeal for the Faith even down to modern times. Tipū Sultan, in south India, engaged in the most systematic endeavours for securing forcible conversions that could be imagined.

In 1788 he issued the following proclamation to the people of Malabar :²

‘ From the period of the conquest until this day, during twenty-four years, you have been a turbulent and refractory people, and, in the wars waged during your rainy season, you have caused numbers of our warriors to taste the draught of martyrdom. Be it so. What is past is past. Hereafter, you must proceed in an opposite manner, dwell quietly and pay your dues like good subjects ; and, since it is the practice with you for one woman to associate with ten men, and you to leave your mothers and sisters unconstrained in their obscene practices, and are thence all born in adultery, and are more shameless in your connections than the beasts of the field, I hereby require you to forsake these sinful practices and to be like the rest of mankind ; and if you are disobedient to these commands, I have made repeated vows to honour the whole of you with Islam and to march all the chief persons to the seat of government.’ This proclamation stirred up a general revolt in Malabar ; and early in 1789 Tipū Sultan prepared to enforce his proclamation with an army of more than twenty thousand men, and issued general orders that every being in the district without distinction should be honoured with Islam, that the houses of such as fled to avoid that honour should be burned, that they should be traced to their lurking places, and that all means of truth and falsehood, force or fraud should be employed to effect their universal conversion. Thousands of Hindus were accordingly circumcised and made to eat beef ; but by the end of 1790 the British army had destroyed the last remnant of Tipū Sultan’s power in Malabar, and this monarch himself perished, early in 1799, at the capture of Seringapatam. Most of the Brāhmans and Nayars who had been forcibly converted subsequently disowned their new religion.³

Perhaps the greater number of Hindus who were forced to accept the new faith experienced a milder form of compulsion, such as that referred to earlier, when one of the caliphs sent

¹ Muhammad Aslam, E.D., VIII.

² Arnold, The Preaching of Islam, 261 f., Westminster Press, London. ³ Ibid.

'letters to the Princes of Hind, inviting them to submit to his authority and embrace Islam'. The historians all speak of the enthusiasm that the sultans and emperors had for 'promulgating the true faith' and doctrines of Islam, and we may assume that quite often the objects of their persuasion were quietly compelled to become Muslims. Fīrūz Shāh, in his Futūḥāt, naively writes that he encouraged his infidel subjects to embrace the religion of the Prophet, and proclaimed that every one who repeated the creed and became a Muslim should be exempt from the jizyah.

Information of this came to the ears of the people at large, and great numbers of Hindus presented themselves, and were admitted to the honour of Islam. Thus they came forward day by day from every quarter, and were exonerated from the jizyah and were favoured with presents and honours.¹

Even the mild Akbar makes a confession to having forced Brāhmans by fear of his power to adopt the religion of his ancestors,² and Aurangzib personally taught 'the sacred kalimah to many infidels with success', and invested them with khil'ats (royal robes) and other favours.³

Aurangzib is also known to have brought about the forced conversion of certain Rajput tribes in the vicinity of Agra, notably the group known as the Malkānās. Sometimes it happened that the head of a tribe or family would accept Islam alone, in order to preserve the ancestral property in the family, and then later others of the family would follow; or leading Hindu families and houses of ruling Hindu princes would be compelled to give some of their women as wives to the kings and emperors and Muslim chiefs.

The latest, and we trust the last example of this extreme type of forced conversion, occurred in the year 1921, during the outbreak known as the Moplah Rebellion.⁴ This unfortunate occurrence was the outcome of agitation among this most ignorant and fanatical section of all the Muslims of India on the part of certain 'Khilāfat' preachers. With more zeal than judgment they sought to impress on the Muslims of this section that their assistance was required

¹ Futūḥāt-Firūz Sāhī, E.D., III, 386.

² Abū'l-Faḍl, Akbar-nāmah, E.D., VI, 60.

³ Bākhṭāwar Khān, E.D., VII, 159.

⁴ J. J. Banninga, The Moplah Rebellion of 1921, M.W., XIII, 379.

to help their brethren throughout India to bring pressure to bear on the Government to assist in restoring to the late Turkish caliphate the part of its empire lost in the Great War, particularly the Hejāz, Palestine, and Syria. The Moplahs proved to be too apt pupils, and their enthusiasm soon got beyond the control of the 'Khilāfat' preachers. Thinking that the way they could best make a contribution to the cause of loyalty to Islam was to take up arms, they proceeded to start a rebellion, in which many innocent Hindus were made the object of their attacks. Numbers who refused to be forcibly converted to Islam were killed, but the numbers that were so converted, in order to save their lives and property, were still greater. This affair reminded people of the south of the days of Haydar 'Alī and Tipū Sultan, and as soon as the rebellion was put down the Hindus immediately arranged to receive back into caste as many of these unfortunate converts as wished to return.

The day of forced conversions as a policy of religion has passed not only beyond the limits of practical possibility in the Islam of today, but well beyond the pale of respectable opinion. Aurangzib and Tipū Sultan would find difficulty in understanding to what lengths the representatives of Islam were willing to go at the Delhi Unity Conference in October, 1924, where they mutually agreed with the Hindus that force should not be used in bringing about conversions, and that people should be free to change their religion without fear of persecution.

CHAPTER III

PEACEFUL PENETRATION

The story of the spread of Islam by the sword has been told so repeatedly that it is not easy for the casual reader of history to realize that its followers ever employed any other method. While India, in common with other conquered countries, furnishes innumerable examples of the employment of military and political power to secure conversions, as we have observed in the preceding chapter, we are now to consider the evidence of peaceful penetration, and the results of the patient missionary endeavours of itinerant preachers and traders. We shall also need to consider the effect of the democratic social system of Islam, with its strong appeal to the down-trodden millions of the depressed classes of Hindus. In fact, there seems to be ample reason for believing that a relatively larger proportion of the present Muslim population of India can be regarded as the result of methods of peaceful penetration than can be associated with the harsher methods of the Muslim conquerors.

There is an abundance of material available on this subject in the extensive biographies of the Indian Muslim saints, which undoubtedly would yield rich reward to the painstaking student.¹ Up to the present, however, very little has been done to uncover this information beyond the able researches of Sir T. W. Arnold, who has presented the main outlines in his chapter on India in The Preaching of Islam. Since there is room for no more than a bare sketch of the extensive operations of Muslim missionary efforts, I hereby acknowledge my indebtedness to Prof. Arnold's investigations in what follows.

THE INFLUENCE OF MUSLIM TRADERS

The reason for mentioning the trader first is not that his was a more potent influence for the dissemination of Islam than that of other peaceful missionaries, but because he was the first to arrive. It is known that Arab traders have had long and intimate contacts with the western coast of India, but the earliest record of any settlement appears to belong to the eighth century. We may even suppose that while Muḥammad b. Quāsim was fitting out his military expedition for the occupation of Sind, which was to become the most distant eastern province of the Damascus government, traders from Arabia were fitting out their ships, and preparing to say farewell to the homeland in anticipation of the new trading colonies to be established on the western coast of India. The Arabs were the people who, in these early centuries, maintained the commercial routes between India and Europe, and conducted a thriving trade in spices, ivory, and gems. Many of them, also, landing at the ports of Sind, travelled across western India and up into Central Asia; and, if we may judge from the missionary activities credited to Muslim traders in other parts of the world, it is more than likely that these traders from Arabia were a very real influence for the spread of the faith.

¹ For extensive bibliography see W. Ivanow, Descriptive Cat. Pers MS., A.S.B., I, 1924, 78-115; and II, 71-90.

One very important factor in the establishment of Muslim settlements on the western coast of India was the encouragement to trade given by the Hindu rulers. The Balhārā dynasty in the north, and the Zamorin of the Malabar coast, were most partial to Muslims; and many a trader, encouraged by the complacent attitude of the Hindu chieftains, took up his abode in Anhilwāra, Cambay and Sindan, or in Calicut and Quilon. They were treated with great consideration, were allowed to build mosques freely, and were permitted to practise their religion without hindrance. Consequently, these early Arab and Persian settlers established themselves all along the coast, intermarried with the Hindu population, and thus gave rise to the Nawaits or Natiā community of the Konkan, and the Māppillas or Moplabs of the Malabar coast.

The traditional account of the introduction of Islam to the Malabar coast is recorded by Zayn-ud-Dīn, an historian of the sixteenth century.¹ He states that the conversion of Cheruman Perumal occurred during the lifetime of the Prophet.

¹ See Arnold, op. cit., 264 ff.

A company of pilgrims from Arabia were making a journey to visit Adam's footprint in Ceylon. On their arrival at Cranganore they paid a visit to the rājā, and told him of the miracle of Muḥammad's having split the moon. Perumal was captivated by this report of the exhibition of such supernatural power. He was converted; and when the pilgrims returned from their journey he secretly joined them, and went with them to Arabia to visit the Prophet, who had not yet fled to Medina.

The king remained in Arabia for some time, and was on the point of returning to his country for the purpose of erecting mosques and spreading the faith of Islam when he fell sick and died. On his death-bed he requested his companions not to abandon the proposed missionary visit to Malabar. To further this object he gave them letters of recommendation to his viceroys, and also requested them to conceal the fact of his death. After the king had passed away, Sharaf bin Mālik and his companions set sail for Cranganore. They were kindly received on the presentation of the king's letters, and were given a grant of land, on which they erected a mosque. One of the missionaries, Mālik bin Dīnār, decided to settle there, but Mālik bin Ḥabīb journeyed throughout Malabar for the purpose of building mosques. He first went to Quilon and is said to have built a mosque there; thence to Hili Marawi, where he built another mosque, and so on, until he had caused the erection of mosques in seven other places before finally returning to Cranganore. Later on he is said to have visited all these places again, to pray in the mosque of each, and then came back, praising and giving thanks to God for the manifestation of the faith of Islam in a land filled with unbelievers.¹

While this is an interesting bit of tradition, it unfortunately lacks the support of any historical evidence; and, so far as actual records are concerned, we are not able to trace the arrival of Arab settlers to the Malabar coast earlier than the eighth century A.D., when some refugees from Iraq came and took up their residence in the country. The narrative is of value, however, in that it shows the extent to which it is believed that Islam had its origin in south India from wholly peaceful methods. The Arab traders enjoyed the favour of the Hindu rulers, whose states profited extensively from the mercantile relations thus established; and as a result no hindrances were put in the way of their proselytizing. In fact, the native converts are known to have been treated with the same respect and consideration as foreigners, even though they may have been recruited from the lowest classes of society.

¹ J. Duncan, art. 'The Coast of Malabar', A.R., V, 9; Arnold, op. cit., 264 f.

One interesting feature of the spread of Islam on the Malabar coast was the part the Zamorin of Calicut took in the coming of the Muslims. He is said to have deliberately encouraged the lower castes to become Muslims, in order to have sufficient sailors to man his warships; and to this end ordered 'that, in every family of fishermen in his dominion, one or more of the male members should be brought up as Muhammadans'.¹ Thus 'a Hindu political necessity' came to lend a hand to the spread of Islam in south India; and, through intermarriage with the women of the country, along the coast, as well as through converts from the lower castes, who welcomed the coming of Islam as a chance to win a degree of social freedom that Hinduism denied them through its cruel and rigid caste system, the immigrant Arab traders, who were constantly being reinforced by new arrivals, gradually brought about the establishment of their faith. So rapid was the process of conversion that took place during the early centuries of the Muslim era, that, had the Portuguese not arrived on the scene when they did, it is claimed, the whole of the Malabar coast would have become solidly Muhammadan.

It would be interesting to know something of the individuals who took part in this early work of propagating Islam in the Malabar country, but unfortunately no records exist. We do find, however, that a special mission was sent, in A.D. 1441, to the Zamorin of Calicut by the Tīmūrid aspirant to the caliphate, Shāh Rukh. 'Abd-ur-Razzāq, who was himself chosen as the special envoy for this mission, has left an account of this unsuccessful expedition, which runs as follows: 'A Muslim ambassador came to the court of Shāh Rukh from the Hindu Zamorin of Calicut and represented to the sultan how excellent and meritorious an action it would be to send a special envoy to the Zamorin, to invite him to accept Islam in accordance with the injunction, "Summon thou to the ways of thy Lord with wisdom and with kindly warning,"¹ and open the bolt of darkness and error that locked his benighted heart, and let the splendour of the light of faith and the brightness of the sun of Knowledge shine into the window of his soul."² However, 'Abd-ur-Razzāq found the Zamorin unresponsive to this proposed plan, so the project had to be abandoned and the special envoy was forced to return to Khurāsān.

¹ Arnold, op. cit., 266.

The testimony of travellers is illuminating in the matter of showing the extent to which these Muslim trade settlements had become permanently established in south India. Ibn Baṭūṭah (A.D. 1304-1377), in the early part of the fourteenth century, notes that there were many rich merchants with whom the towns of Malabar were crowded, and that five mosques stood as an ornament to Quilon. In the fifteenth century, 'Abd-ur-Razzāq writes that, on every Friday and solemn feast day, 'the khutbah was read according to the rules of Islam'.³

The Muslim community to-day on the Malabar coast of south India is spoken of as the Mappillas or Moplabs, and it is the direct result of the coming of these early Arab traders of the eighth and succeeding centuries. To-day they number well over one million, and are found in the states of Madras, and Coorg. Their language is Malayālam. They are very bigoted and ignorant as a class, and have given trouble from time to time by their fanatical outbursts, the last and most serious of all being in 1921,⁴ when they carried on a real rebellion. They endeavoured to set up a Muslim kingdom, and perpetrated forced conversions among the Hindu community. Even to-day Islam is spreading rapidly among the Hindu low-castes through the active but quiet efforts of the Mappillas. Looking farther afield, there is no doubt that

¹ Qur'ān, xvi, 126.

² 'Abd-ur-Razzāq, tr. R. H. Major, India in the Fifteenth Century, 13 ff.; Arnold, op. cit., 266.

³ Major, op. cit., 15.

⁴ See p. 34.

Arab traders not only introduced Islam into Ceylon, but that it was even carried from the Malabar coast to the Maldivé and Laccadive Islands, which are now wholly Muslim.

Another interesting Muslim community of south India, which seems to owe its origin to Muslim traders, is that of the Labbāis on the east Tamil coast. One account relates that they are the descendants of some Arab traders who were shipwrecked on the Indian coast, and compelled to settle there. Another tradition says that they were Arab refugees, exiled from Iraq in the early part of the eighth century by Ḥajjāj bin Yūsuf of Baṣrah, who first landed on the Konkan. Some of them remained there, but others, after crossing over India, settled on the coast, north-east of Cape Comorin. Like the Arabs of the west coast, they intermarried with the Tamil tribes of the lower castes, and steadily added to their community. At the present time they number three hundred and eighty-two thousand. They use the Tamil language written in the Arabic character, with a large sprinkling of Arabic words.¹

Lastly, mention should be made of the influence of traders, as recorded by al-Balādhurī, in the north-western part of India, which supports the testimony already given, that the Muslim trader has in his quiet way had no little share in the spread of Islam. This author relates an account of the conversion of a king of 'Usayfān, somewhere between Multan and Kashmir, in the caliphate of Mu'taṣim (A.D. 833-842). This king became disgusted because prayers to an idol could not save his son's life, so he attacked the temple, destroyed the idol, and killed the priests. Then he invited a party of Muslim traders to come to him, 'who made known to him the unity of God'. Whereupon he believed in the Unity and became a Muslim.²

THE WORK OF MISSIONARIES

Throughout the history of Islam in India the missionary, or itinerant preacher, has been a relatively important factor. His work has not received anything like the attention that it deserves, from the standpoint of the results accomplished.

¹ Thurston, Castes and Tribes of Southern India, IV, 199.

² Al-Balādhurī, Futūh-ul-Buldān, E.D., I., 129, 130.

Most writers have chosen to stress the military and political aspects of Muslim life in the country, and, with the exception of the researches of Sir T. W. Arnold, the Muslim missionary has been hitherto almost entirely neglected. It must not be thought that the Muslim preachers were organized for their propaganda work in any modern way. Nor is there any proof, save in one or two instances, that they were ever brought in by the Muslim conquerors. Usually they have been individuals endowed with piety and religious zeal, frequently men of learning, who, through their own personal interest in the spread of Islam, and inspired with a divine call, have been content to wander from place to place and gather disciples.

The period of this individualistic missionary activity extends from the beginning of the eleventh century right up to the present time, though with considerable irregularity. The records show that there were very few missionaries in the first two centuries beginning with the time of Maḥmūd's invasions. But, in the thirteenth century A.D., well-known names begin to appear, particularly that of Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī of Ajmīr. The fourteenth century A.D. seems to have been the time of the greatest display of missionary zeal, since the number of missionaries of whose names and work we find a record exceeds that of any other single century. The fifteenth and sixteenth centuries following showed a tendency to decline in missionary work, probably because of the marked spirit of toleration in the policy of the Mughul emperors; and in the seventeenth centuries names are all but lacking. However, this may be to a large extent due to the fact that, for want of organization of any sort, no careful records could be kept; and, in the absence of such, we are not justified in assuming that no missionary work was carried on. In fact, we know that quiet personal work must have gone on all the time as it does at the present day, resulting in numerous accessions to the Muslim community.

One of the earliest missionaries of whom we have any record was Shaykh Ismā'il, who came to Lahore about the year A.D. 1005. He belonged to the Bukharā Sayyids, and was distinguished both for his secular and religious learning. It is said that crowds 'flocked to listen to his sermons, and that no unbeliever ever came into personal contact with him without being converted to the faith of Islam.¹

To the eleventh century also belong 'Abd Allāh,² a missionary from the Yaman, who began his work of preaching in Gujarāt about the year A.D. 1067. It is said that through the performance of his miracles many Hindus were converted to Islam. The Bohrahs regard him as their first missionary.³

In the twelfth century we meet with the name of Nūr-ud-Dīn, another Ismā'ilī missionary, more generally known as Nūr Satāgar, the name which he adopted in deference to the Hindus. He was sent from Alamūt, in Persia, the headquarters of the Grand Master of the Ismā'ilīs, and came to Gujarāt in the reign of Siddhā Rāj (A.D. 1094-1143). It is said that he was instrumental in the conversion of the Kanbīs, Kharwas, and Korīs, all low-caste folk. The Khojahs regard Nūr Satāgar as their first missionary.⁴

In the thirteenth century there are several names of importance. One of these is that of Sayyid Jalāl-ud-Dīn of Bukhārā (A.D. 1190-1291). He settled in Uch, in Sind, in A.D. 1244, and was successful in winning many converts to the faith of Islam. Many of his descendants are still revered as saints, and even to this day his tomb is guarded by members of his family. This remarkable family has been responsible for a widening circle of religious influence.⁵ Sayyid Ṣadr-ud-Dīn and his son, Hassan Kabir-ud-Dīn, who laboured in the neighbourhood of Uch, are likewise held to have been the cause of many turning to Islam in the thirteenth century, and the latter is said to have possessed such hypnotic influence that as soon as his glance fell upon any Hindu he would at once accept the faith.⁶ Sayyid Aḥmad Kabīr, known as Makhdūm-i-Jahāniyān and grandson of Jalāl-ud-Dīn, is said to have been the means of the conversion of several tribes in the Punjab.

Perhaps the most famous Muslim missionary of India was Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī, who died in Ajmīr in A.D. 1236. A native of Sīstān, in what was then east Persia, he is said to have received his missionary call to India while on

¹ Arnold, op. cit., 280.

² Najm-ul-Ghan Khān, Madhāhib-ul-Islam, 272.

³ See also p. 98.

⁴ Arnold, op. cit., 275.

⁵ Ibid., 281.

⁶ Ibid., 282.

a pilgrimage to Medina. The Prophet came to him in a dream and said to him, 'The Almighty has entrusted the country of India to thee. Go thither and settle in Ajmīr. By God's help, the faith of Islam shall, through thy piety and that of thy followers, be spread in that land.' According to the account, he obeyed the call and came to Ajmīr, where idolatry prevailed under Hindu rule. One of his first converts was a yogi, the spiritual preceptor of the Rājā himself. Little by little Mu'in-ud-Dīn attracted to himself a body of disciples, whom he had won over from infidelity by his teachings. His fame as a teacher became so well known abroad that Hindus are said to have come to him in great numbers, and that many were induced to embrace Islam. Even during his short stay in the city of Delhi, when on his way to Ajmīr, he is said to have converted seven hundred persons.¹

Late in the same century, Bū Ali Qualandar, a missionary from Persian Iraq, came to north India and settled at Pānīpat, near Delhi. The Muslim Rajputs of this place declare that they are descendants of one Amīr Singh, who was a convert of this saintly man. Bū 'Alī Qualandar died there in A.D. 1324, and his tomb is still an object of veneration to many pilgrims.²

Generally speaking, Muslim missionaries have followed in the wake of conquering armies. This was the case in the north, and in Bengal especially. Muhammad Bakhtyār Khaljī swept over Bihar and Bengal at the close of the twelfth century A.D., and founded a Muslim kingdom there with headquarters at Gaur. Under the protection of this Muslim sovereignty, missionaries of the faith found freedom for the exercise of their zeal; and, as a result of certain social and religious causes, they were eminently successful. In eastern Bengal, Islam is not confined to the cities and centres of government, as is largely the case in northern India. Here, even under the admittedly severe measures of many of the Muslim rulers to spread the religion of Islam, but few, comparatively, of the village people embraced the religion of their conquerors. But in eastern Bengal we find it mostly in the villages; and, judging from the manners and customs of the followers of the Prophet, their physical appearance, and the caste distinctions which they still retain, it seems clear that these converts were recruited from the original inhabitants of the soil.¹ In this part of India, Hinduism was not nearly so well organized and consolidated as in the northern, western, and southern parts of the country. The inhabitants were under the influence of a crude form of Buddhism; and, despised as they were by their proud Aryan rulers, who held them in disdain, they apparently welcomed the Muslim missionaries gladly. The following statement of W.W. Hunter would seem to be quite a fair interpretation of the response made by the people of eastern Bengal to the work of the Muslim missionaries :

¹ Arnold, op. cit., 281.

² Ibid., 282.

To these poor people, fishermen, hunters, pirates and low-caste tillers of the soil, Islam came as a revelation from on high. It was the creed of the ruling race; its missionaries were men of zeal, who brought the Gospel of the unity of God and the equality of men in His sight to a despised and neglected population.²

Missionary efforts in Bengal, as elsewhere, are attested by the graves and shrines of missionaries, who are credited with having been zealous for the spread of their faith. One of the earliest of these belonged to the thirteenth century, Shaykh Jalāl-ud-Dīn Tabrīzī, who died in A.D. 1244. He is said to have visited Bengal and died there, though the place of his tomb is unknown. Yet his memory is revered; and a shrine in his honour has been erected, which is still visited by pilgrims.³

During the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries A.D., missionary work was carried on in the Punjab, Kashmir, the Deccan, western India, and eastern India with increasing zeal. In the Punjab we find Bahā-ul-Ḥaqq, Bābā Farid-ud-Dīn, of Pāk Pattan and Aḥmad Kabīr, known as Makhdūm-i-Jahāniyān, at the height of their endeavour. The first of these is said to have converted many on the plains of the western Punjab, and Baba Farid-ud-Dīn is said to have been the means of the conversion of some sixteen tribes.⁴ Bulbul Shāh is said to have been the first missionary to

¹ Sir H. H. Risley, The Tribes and Castes of Bengal.

² Arnold, op. cit., 279.

³ Ibid., 280. See also Ibn Baṭūṭah, tr. Yule, Cathay and the Way Thither, IV, 151.

⁴ Arnold, op. cit., 281 f.

Kashmir. In the early part of the fourteenth century he converted the first Muhammadan king of that country, who took the name Şadr-ud-Dīn. Later in this century, in A.D. 1388, the progress of Islam was greatly advanced by the coming of Sayyid 'Alī Hamadānī, who is said to have brought with him seven hundred Sayyids. These men 'established hermitages all over the country, and by their influence appear to have assured the acceptance of the new religion'.¹ We are told, also that their arrival seems to have aroused considerable fanaticism, for the Sultan Sikandar (A.D. 1393-1417) was given the name But-shikān (idol-smasher), from his destruction of Hindu idols and temples.²

In the Deccan and western India we find the well-known Sayyid Muhammad Gīsū Darāz and Pīr Mahābīr Khamdāyat at work. The latter was an Arab preacher, who came as a missionary to Bijāpūr about the year A.D. 1304, and began work among the peasants. Among these are to be found Muslims who claim that their ancestors were Jains converted by him. At the close of the same century, Gīsū Darāz was working among the Hindus of the Poona district, where he met with success, and later was similarly successful in Belgaum. He was laid to rest from his labours at Gulbarga.

In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, Sind and western India particularly were the scene of the labours of Muslim missionaries. In Sind and Cutch, Sayyid Yūsuf-ud-Dīn and Pīr Şadr-ud-Dīn became famous for their work. We are told that Sayyid Yūsuf-ud-Dīn, who was a descendant of 'Abd-ul-Quādir Jilānī, was bidden in a dream to leave Baghdad for India and convert its inhabitants to Islam. He came to Sind in A.D. 1422, and, after labouring there for ten years, he succeeded in winning over to Islam seven hundred families of the Lohānā caste, who followed the example of two of their number, by name Sundarji and Hansraj; these men embraced Islam, after seeing miracles performed by the saint, and on their conversion received the names of Ādamji and Tāj Mohammed respectively. Under the leadership of the grandson of the former, these people migrated to Cutch, where their numbers were increased by converts from among the Cutch Lohānās.³

Pīr Şadr-ud-Dīn began his labours in Sind about the year A.D. 1430. He was an Ismā'ilī missionary who was head of the Khojah sect.¹ He made certain concessions to Hindu beliefs and customs, with the result that he won his first converts in the villages and towns of Upper Sind. He also worked in Cutch 'and from these parts the doctrines of his sect spread southwards through Gujarāt to Bombay'.²

¹ Arnold, op. cit., 292.

² Ibid.

³ Ibid., 274.

In Gujarāt and other parts of western India, missionaries of Islam were actively engaged in spreading their doctrines. Imām Shāh of Pīrānā and Dāwal Shāh Pīr are two whose names are linked together in the latter half of the fifteenth century A.D. The former is said to have converted a large body of cultivators by bringing about a fall of rain after two seasons of scarcity. On another occasion, meeting a band of Hindu pilgrims passing through Pīrāna on their way to Benares, he offered to take them there; they agreed, and in a moment were in the holy city, where they bathed in the Ganges and paid their vows; they then awoke to find themselves still in Pīrāna, and adopted the faith of the saint who could perform such a miracle.³

Mālik 'Abd-ul-Latīf, the real name of Dāwal Shāh Pīr, was the son of one of the nobles of Mahmūd Begarha (A.D. 1458-1511), of the Muslim kingdom in Gujarat. Many of the Cutch Muslims hold the Pīr as their spiritual leader, and assert that through his influence many Hindus were converted.

In Nāsik are to be found the descendants of Shāh Muhammad Ṣādiq, an Arabian missionary, who came from Medina in A.D. 1568, thus following another Arabian missionary, Khvajah Khunmīr Ḥusaynī, who laboured in the same region fifty years before, with considerable success.

To Kashmir, towards the close of the fifteenth century, came a missionary from Tālish, on the Caspian Sea, by the name of Mīr Shams-ud-Dīn. He was a Shī'ah, and with the help of his disciples is said to have soon converted a large number of people.⁴

Arnold tells of another group of people in southern India, the Dudekulas, who live by cotton cleaning (as their name denotes) and by weaving coarse fabrics, and attribute their conversion to Bābā Fakh̄r-ud-

¹ See p. 101.

² Arnold, op. cit., 275.

³ Ibid., 277

⁴ Ibid., 292

Dīn, whose tomb they revere at Penukonda.¹ Legend says that he was originally a king of Sīstān, who abdicated his throne in favour of his brother, became a religious mendicant and set out on a proselytizing mission. The legend goes on to say that he finally settled at Penukonda in the vicinity of a Hindu temple, where his presence was unwelcome to the Rājā of the place. Instead of appealing to force, he applied several tests to discover whether the Muhammadan saint or his own priest was the better qualified by sanctity to possess the temple. As a final test, he had them both tied up in sacks filled with lime, and thrown into tanks. The Hindu priest never reappeared, but Bābā Fakhr-ud-Dīn asserted the superiority of his faith by being miraculously transported to a hill outside the town. The Rājā hereupon became a Mussalman, and his example was followed by a large number of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood, and the temple was turned into a mosque.²

Another community, found in south India, that is an excellent example of group conversion by missionaries is that of the Ravuttans, found in the districts of Madura, Tinnevely, Coimbatore, North Arcot, and the Nilgiris. These people assert that they were converted by the preaching of missionaries, whose tombs they venerate to the present day. Of these the leading one seems to have been Sayyid Nathar Shāh (A.D. 969-1039), variously called also Nādir Shāh and Nathad Valī. This man, who is said to have converted large numbers of Hindus to Islam, made his headquarters at Trichinopoly, after wandering much in Arabia, Persia, and northern India. His tomb is a famous place of pilgrimage in south India.³

In considering the work of the earlier Muslim missionaries notice should be taken of the fact that most of the evidence recorded is derived from biographers who undoubtedly have given liberal interpretation to the ability and success of their heroes. Much of their success is attributed to wonder-working powers and the effect of magic on the minds of the credulous, some of the miracles being recorded and others being referred to in the most general terms. Again, others seem to have attracted followers to themselves because of their undoubted piety, which is a matter of great consideration among the Hindus. But all seem to have made an impression and won a hearing because of the simple and straightforward religious and social precepts of Islām, which exalt the unity of God, declare the abomination of idolatry, and proclaim the equality of all believers as opposed to the oppressive system of caste, which has been for so many centuries the blight of Hinduism. So, after all due allowance is made for the influence of the miraculous, it remains without question that, as a result of the piety and zeal of the missionaries and the message they had to proclaim, they undoubtedly did win conspicuous success. Just how much may never be measured, and it is a curious thing, to say the least, that in the record of the historians of the kings and emperors of the various dynasties practically no mention is made of the work of the missionaries in spreading the religion of Islām, and thus aiding the rulers who so frequently styled themselves defenders and propagators of the faith. Whether this absence of comment is deliberate or accidental we may never know. Whether it indicates, as some may think, that the success of the missionaries was not nearly so great as is usually attributed to them, is likewise a matter that cannot fully be settled. Nevertheless, the presumption is strong that they were successful, and it is more than likely that the absence of comment is due to the fact that the historians were too interested in royal affairs to busy themselves with the activities of such humble folk as missionaries.

¹ 86 Miles north of Bangalore.

² Arnold, op. cit., 267.

³ Madras District Gazetteers, Trichinopoly, I, 338, Madras, 1907; Arnold, op. cit., 267.

MISSIONARY WORK SINCE 1800

The work of individuals has been going on as before ; and, having come under critical review, results can be more accurately evaluated. In the early part of the nineteenth century there was a remarkable revival of the Muhammadan religion in Bengal, particularly under the inspiration of the Wahhābī reformers,¹ Ḥājī Sharī'at Allāh and his son Dūdḥū Miyān, who won many converts from among unbelievers. Nor can the conversions be said to have stopped at the present time.

Since the middle of the nineteenth century there has been a widespread revival of Islām all over India, and the annual conversions are estimated anywhere from ten thousand to six hundred thousand. Some parts of the country report no missionary activity whatever, while in others it is very marked, notably in Bengal and on the Malabar coast. But there are no means of judging the accuracy of any of the statements made. Occasionally gross exaggeration is the only expression that will characterize the work of the preachers, as when in the Punjab a certain Hājī Muhammad is reported to have converted as many as two hundred thousand.¹ It is said that between the years 1901 and 1911 conversions frequently took place at the Jāmi 'Masjids of Lahore and Delhi. At the former two thousand are said to have accepted Islām and six hundred and forty-six at the latter, while no fewer than forty thousand must have embraced Islām during the decade in the Punjab alone. The converts there were mostly from the lower classes of the Chuhras and Chamārs.²

¹ See ' Wahhābī Movement ', pp. 178 ff.

On the Malabar coast conversions are being made from among the Tiyans, Mukkuvāns, or fishermen caste, from the Cheruman, or agricultural labourers, and other low castes. At Ponānī, under the auspices of the Minnat-ul-Islām Sabhā, there are two schools for new converts, one for boys and another for girls. Here also resides the spiritual head of the majority of the Muslims of Malabar, who directs the work of the Sabhā (Society). It is reported that more than six thousand converts have passed through these schools since they were organized. Those under instruction are not only given free tuition in the tenets of the new faith, but are given material assistance as well. There are sixteen branches of the Sabhā in south Malabar, Travancore, and Cochin; and extensive charities have been organized.³

So numerous have the conversions from Hinduism been that there is a decided tendency for the Muhammadans, of both the west and east coasts of southern India, to retain the aboriginal type from which they are drawn. During the decade ending in 1911, the Mappillas on the west coast increased fourteen per cent, largely through accessions from the lower classes of Hindus. In fact, the increase has been so rapid as to make it possible that, in a few years, the whole of the lower grades of Hindu society of the west coast may become Muhammadans. This possibility receives support from the evidence of the Census Superintendent of 1881, who wrote concerning the decrease in the number of the Cheruman caste as follows :

¹ Garcin de Tassy, La Langue et la Litterature Hindoustanies Paris, 1874, 343.

² C.I.R., 1911, XIV, Punjab, pt. I, 170.

³ C.I.R., Madras, 1911, XII, pt. I, 54

This caste numbered ninety-nine thousand in Malabar at the Census of 1871, and in 1881 only sixty-four thousand, seven hundred and thirty-five. There are forty thousand fewer Cherumans than there would have been but for some disturbing influence, and this is very well known to be conversion to Muhammadanism.¹

There have been many zealous missionaries working in recent times throughout India with varying results. The most noted of these was undoubtedly Khwājah Hasan Nizāmī of Delhi, who was himself the living centre of a most active and interesting tablīgh (propaganda) movement. He was a Sūfi of the Chistī order, and had followers all over the country. He was the editor-in-chief of several papers, and developed a considerable amount of literature in the form of tracts, pamphlets and books, which were circulated not only in Urdu but other Muslim languages of India as well. His preachers were instructed to work especially among the untouchables and to convert them. He gave the fourfold object of his 'Tablīghī Mission' as follows :

1. To strengthen Muslims through religious teaching.
2. To assist Muslims to improve their economic condition.
3. To inspire Muslims with missionary zeal.
4. To propagate Islām among non-Muslims.

Other important modern missionary agencies are the Jam'iyat-i-Tablīgh-ul-Islām, and the Aḥmadiyah propaganda organizations.

OTHER CAUSES OF CONVERSION

When it comes to considering the classes of Hindus from which converts have largely come, it is impossible to account for the size of the numbers wholly through the militant or peaceful zeal of conquerors, traders, and missionaries. There are other elements that enter in from the side of the Hindus themselves, and from the structure of their society, that have been an aid to the spread of Islam. The first of these factors, which have been effective from the earliest times, has been the oppressive social conditions under which the low castes have had to suffer. Consequently any outcaste man, who wished to escape the insults and degradation imposed upon him by his social status, could easily find a welcome freedom by accepting the benefit of a system of religion which has no outcastes, and which permits prince and sweeper to worship together in the house of God.

¹ Thurston, Castes and Tribes of Southern India, II, 60.

In this way alone can the large number of so-called low-caste Muslims, such as the weavers and oil-makers, water-carriers, leather-workers, and even sweepers, be accounted for. Not alone in Bengal, but in Uttar Pradesh, the Punjab, and western India this process of assimilation to a higher form of social life has been going on for centuries. In the middle of the sixteenth century a very remarkable illustration of this sort occurred in the north-eastern part of Bengal. An aboriginal tribe known as the Koch became practically Hinduized; but the lower classes, on finding themselves regarded as outcastes, all became Muhammadans.¹

A very common cause of conversion to Islām arises when a Hindu for any reason loses caste and is ostracized. The door of Islām has always been open to receive all such. Still other causes are found in illicit love affairs, where a Muslim man falls in love with a Hindu woman, or vice versa. In either case, the Hindu must become a Muslim, for there can be no union of Muslim women with unbelievers, and the Hindu women who enter into such alliances perforce become Muslims, and assume Muslim names.

Still another factor which has not been without its influence on Hindus of the lower castes, in leading them into the fold of Islām, is to be found in the fact that enormous numbers of them worship at the shrines of Muslim saints. I have again and again observed Hindus paying their devotions to such shrines, on the principle that they should seek help from all spiritual powers possible; and it is recorded that families have been known to become Muslims from a vow having been made to some saint, if he would grant a son to an imploring father. One such instance is forthcoming from Ghātampur, in the district of Kanpur, where there is one branch of a large family that is now Muslim as the result of a vow of their ancestor, Ghātam Deo Bais, 'who, while praying for a son at the shrine of a Muhammadan saint, Madār Shāh, promised that if his prayer was granted half his descendants should be brought up as Moslems'.¹ That this process has gone on for centuries, and is still proceeding, is indicated by the fact that in northern India in the Census of 1891 there were two million, three hundred and thirty-three thousand, six hundred and forty-three Hindus of the lower castes who were classed as worshippers of Muhammadan saints.²

¹ E. T. Dalton, Descriptive Ethnology of Bengal, Calcutta, 1872, 89.

There can be no doubt that, during all the centuries of Islām in India, one of the very strongest assets has been the privilege of brotherhood, which it has held out freely to all who would come within the pale. True it is that certain aspects of the caste-system are to be found among Indian Muslims to-day; but even so, these disabilities are nothing compared with those of the Hinduism from which these inherited caste-features have emerged; and Islam, even in its Hindu environment, knows no outcastes. What Arnold says is no doubt true. 'It is this absence of class prejudices which constitutes the real strength of Islam in India, and enables it to win so many converts from Hinduism.'³

¹ Arnold, op. cit., 289; Gazetteer of the N.W.P., VI, 64, 238.

² C.I.R., 1891, XVI, 1, 217, 244.

³ Arnold, op. cit., 291.

CHAPTER IV

ORGANIZATION OF THE SUNNI COMMUNITY

ISLAM in India has never functioned as an organic unity. It has never developed a thorough-going organization, which through its recognized representatives and hierarchy could exercise a far-reaching and effective control over the whole community, so that in matters of religion it could act as a unit. However, some earnest efforts have been made during the last century to achieve such organizations, with promising results. During the period of Muslim domination, the unity of the faithful was brought about, to a certain extent, by the ruler, who was regarded as the chief custodian of Islamic law as well as the defender of religion.

While, in the beginning, this dependence on the power of the ruler was an undoubted help in the establishment of Islam in the country, there can be no doubt that this reliance on the strong arm of the government and on the leadership of a ruler to bring glory to the faith has, in the long run, resulted in producing weakness in the community rather than strength. The same has been true in the case of Christianity whenever it has leaned too hard on temporal power for strength and protection. Yet there is this difference, that the Christian Church has always maintained a spiritual or ecclesiastical organization independent of the temporal; whereas, in theory at least, in Islam there should be no distinction between the temporal and the spiritual. The two organizations merge into one. The Caliph was not only the head of the State, but was also the head of the Church; for Islām, under ideal conditions, is not a State Religion but a Religious State.

Likewise, the king or emperor in an independent Muslim country was regarded as the viceroy of the Caliph, and as such was the recognized head of the religion of Islām in his dominions. Therefore, so long as Muslim rule could be maintained in India the people looked to the ruler, whether petty chief, king, or emperor, as the visible centre of religious as well as temporal power. Keeping in mind, then, this relationship existing between the sovereign and his people in matters of religion, it is very interesting to observe the development of Islām in India as a religious community, along with all the ecclesiastical, legal, and educational institutions that were set up. We shall devote our attention particularly to the evolution of organization in the Sunnī community, leaving the Shi'ahs for consideration in the following chapter.

EARLY RELATIONS TO THE CALIPHATE

We shall begin by tracing the relation of Indian Islām to the caliphate from the earliest times. We have already noted at the beginning how the Caliph 'Umar had his eyes fixed on India as a field for the extension of Islam, and was only deterred therefrom because he disliked sending naval expeditions. We have similarly noted how his successor, 'Uthamān, desired to send an expedition into India, but was kept from it because the only land route then open was through southern Persia and Baluchistan, a desert country which it was exceedingly difficult to cross. But finally, in the reign of the Umayyad Caliph Walīd, when Muhammad b. Quāsīm invaded Sind (A.D. 711) the colonial government which was set up was under the Umayyad caliphate. We learn, that Ḥajjāj the governor of Baṣrah, wrote to Muhammad b. Quāsīm that throughout the cities and towns captured 'the khutbah should be read and the coin struck in the name of this government'.¹ And throughout the period in which the Arab governors held sway over Sind, the khutbah continued to be read in the name of the Khalifah.² Even in the distribution of the booty taken by the early Arab invaders, the Khalifah was remembered in the portion of one-fifth that was reserved for him, as directed by the Qur'ān.³

Mahmūd of Ghaznī, as ruler of his Indian possessions, recognized the supreme authority of 'the successor of the Prophet of God'. But Iltutmish was the first independent ruler of India (A.D. 1210-1235) to receive the investiture of a diploma and title, which came from al-Mustanshir, the

¹ Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 206.

² Al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, ul-Buldān, E.D., I, 210.

³ E.D., History of India, I, 462.

'Abbāsīd Caliph of Baghdad in the year A.D. 1229. That he appreciated the honour and his heavy religious responsibility to the full, is indicated in the inscription found over the archway of the main entrance to the Arhāi-Din-kā-Jhonprā, at Ajmīr, where he speaks of himself as 'the defender of Islam' and 'the helper of the Caliph of God'. Iltutmish had the document from the caliph read before a great assembly at Delhi, and from that date put the name of the caliph on his coins, and had his name read in the khutbah.

Iltutmish had made a good beginning in acknowledging the overlordship of the caliph, but the story of what followed has been the subject of extensive research by Prof. T. W. Arnold, so we shall let him continue the recital of matters which are pertinent to the subject in hand. Referring to Iltutmish and later rulers he says :

His successors followed this pious example. The name of the last 'Abbāsīd Khalīfah of Baghdad, Musta'šim (1242-1258), first appears on the coins of 'Alā-ūd-Dīn Mas'ūd-Shāh (1241-1246); and, though Musta'šim was put to death by the Mongols in 1258, his name still appears on the coins of successive kings of Delhi, e.g. Mahmūd Shāh Nāšir ad-Dīn (1246-1265), Ghiyāth ad-Dīn Balban (1265-1287), and Mu'izz ad-Dīn Kayqūbād (1287-1290), the last monarch of the so-called 'Slave' dynasty; and the first of these continued to have the name of Musta'šim mentioned in the khutbah.

A new dynasty arose, that of the Khaljī; the same need for legitimization was apparently still felt, and the coins of Jalāl-ad-Dīn Fīrūz Shāh II (1290-1295) continued to bear the name of Musta'šim, though this caliph had been trampled to death by the Mongols more than thirty years before.

What was an unfortunate Muslim monarch to do who felt that his title was insecure? He knew that it was only his sword that had set him on the throne, that his own dynasty might at any time be displaced, as he had himself displaced the dynasty that had preceded him, while his legal advisers and religious guides told him that the only legitimate source of authority was the Khalīfah, the Imām, and he realized that all his devout Muslim subjects shared their opinion. So he went on putting the name of the dead Musta'šim on his coins, because he could find no other, and the Muslim theory of the state had not succeeded in adjusting itself to the fact that there was no Khalīfah or Imām in existence. His successor, 'Alā-ad-Dīn Mohammed Shāh I (1295-1315), got out of the difficulty by ceasing to insert Musta'šim's name and by describing himself merely as Yamīn al-Khilāfat Nāšir Amīr al-Mu'minīn, 'The right hand of the Caliphate, the helper of the Commander of the Faithful'; and this was sufficient for the satisfaction of tender consciences; though in reality he was giving no help at all to any caliph, any more than either of his predecessors had done, who had seen the unhappy Mustaʿshim trampled to death without moving a finger, though they had gone on making use of his name for their own selfish political purposes.¹

In common with efforts made by other independent Muslim princes, some of the earlier Indian monarchs aspired to assume the dignity of the caliphate of the Muslim world. One of these Sultan 'Alā-ud-Dīn Khaljī (1296-1316) of Delhi, was styled by his biographer, the great poet, Amīr Khusru, 'the Caliph of the Age', and the 'Shadow of the Merciful on the heads of mankind'. His son, Quṭb ad-Dīn Mubārak Shāh (1316-1320), had inscribed on some of his coins, 'The most exalted Imām, the Khalīfah of the Lord of the worlds, the pole-star of the earth and of the faith, Abū'l-Muẓaffar, Khalīfah of God.'²

Whenever a new king came to the throne at Delhi or in any of the independent principalities of India it was the custom to have the khutbah read in the name of the ruling sovereign, thus recognizing his religious as well as his governmental authority, and the fact that he caused it to be done indicated that he accepted the usual Muslim ruler's responsibility for defending and extending the faith within his dominions.

But the kings at Delhi were not always as fortunate as Iltutmish in obtaining the investiture of authority as Muslim rulers from the caliphate; nor, if we read history aright, did they always regard it as important or necessary. Hence it became the custom for the king to have his own name only read in the khutbah; for we read that when Muhammad Shāh Tughluq came to the throne in A.D. 1324, he found this practice prevailing and felt much concerned about it. After making diligent inquiry, he finally decided that the Khalīfah of Egypt was the rightful successor of the 'Abbāsīd dynasty, and so 'he had his own name and style removed from his coins, and that of the Khalīfah (of Egypt) substituted', and, in A.D. 1343, his ambassador to Egypt, Hājī Sa'īd Sarsari, returned to the sultan, bringing 'honours and a robe from the Khalīfah'. The reason for the above was that he had come to the conclusion, that no king or prince could exercise regal power without confirmation by the Khalīfah of the race of 'Abbās, and that every king who had or should hereafter reign without such confirmation had been or would be overpowered . . . From that date permission was given that out of respect the Khalifah's name should be repeated in the prayers for Sabbaths and holy days . . . and it was also ordered that in mentioning the names of the kings in the khutbah, they should be declared to have reigned under the authority and confirmation of the 'Abbasi Khalifahs. And the name of the Khalifah was ordered to be inscribed on lofty buildings, and no other name besides.¹

¹ Arnold, The Caliphate, 86 ff., Oxford University Press.

² Ibid., 116.

Likewise, when the pious Fīrūz Shāh III came to the throne, in A.D. 1351, he counted it a great honour to have the recognition of the caliph ; for he tells us that the greatest and best of honours that I obtained through God's mercy was that by my obedience and piety and friendliness and submission to the Khalifah, the representative of the holy Prophet, my authority was confirmed. . . . A diploma was sent me confirming my authority as deputy of the Khilāfat, and the leader of the faithful was graciously pleased to honour me with the title Sayyid as-Salāṭīn. He also bestowed on me robes, a banner, a sword, a ring, and a footprint as badges of honour and distinction.²

Nowhere do we find a better illustration of the Sultan in India being regarded as the national head of the religion of Islām than in these two instances cited above. He was held by all to be the one person in whom the executive function and glory of Islām were centred in the land. If he was strong and able as a ruler, great was the power and glory of Islām. If he was weak and incapable, Islām suffered in proportion.

It is said also that Khidr Khān, of the so-called Sayyid dynasty of Delhi (A.D. 1414-1421), had the khutbah read in the name of Shāh Rukh, son of Tīmūr, who made great efforts to get himself recognized as Caliph, and even provided the text of the khutbah that Khidr Khān was to have read :

O God, cause the foundations of the kingdom and of the religion to abide forever, uplift the banner of Islam and strengthen the pillars of the incontestible Shari'at, by maintaining the kingdom of the exalted Sultan, the just Khāquān, the noble overlord of the necks of the nations, the ruler of the sultans of the Arabs and the non-Arabs, the shadow of God upon the earth, the ruler over land and sea, who enlarges the foundations of peace and security, who uplifts the banner of justice and benevolence, who protects the territories of God, who gives help to the servants of God, and to whom

¹ Diya-ud-Din Barani, Ta'rikh-i-Firuz Shahi, E.D., III, 249, 250.

² Futihat-i-Firuz Shahi, E.D., III, 387.

the help of God has been given, to whom has been granted victory over his enemies, the supporter of truth, the world and religion, Shāh Rukh Bahādūr Khān may Almighty God make his rule and sultanate abide for ever in the Caliphate over the world, and grant increase of His goodness and blessings for the inhabitants of the earth.¹

THE CALIPHATE PRETENSIONS OF THE MUGHUL EMPERORS

One of the interesting developments in India in respect to the relation to the caliphate came about during the flourishing rule of the Mughul emperors. The very glory, wealth, and power of their court brought about a decidedly independent attitude in respect to the overlordship of the Ottoman Caliph, the significance of which is well pointed out by Arnold, who graphically describes the situation as follows :

During the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the only Sunni monarchs who could rival the Ottoman Sultans in wealth and extent of territory were the Mughal emperors of India. After the manner of their ancestors in Transoxiana,² they commonly assumed the title of Khalīfah, and from the reign of Akbar onwards they called their capital dār al-khilāfat (the abode of the Caliphate). Akbar's famous gold coin bore the inscription 'The great Sultan, the exalted Khalīfah'. It certainly never formed any part of the policy of the Mughals to acknowledge the overlordship of the Ottoman Sultan; their own wealth and power made them independent of outside assistance, even if any could have been rendered by an empire so far removed from their own, nor did the current theory of the Caliphate suggest submission to some central Muslim authority. . . . Correspondence was opened in the name of Akbar in 1557 with (the Ottoman) Sultan Sulaiman, when Akbar was only a boy, fourteen years of age; advantage was taken of the presence in India of the Turkish admiral, Sidī 'Alī Katībī, to establish relations with the Ottoman court, and 'string the kingly pearls of confidence on the thread of affection', and 'bind together the chains of union and love'.

Accordingly, Sulaymān is addressed as 'he who has attained the exalted rank of the caliphate', the familiar verse (Qur'ān, xxxv, 37) is quoted; and prayers are offered that his caliphate may abide for ever. At the same time the Ottoman Sultan is reminded that there is now installed on 'the seat of the Sultanate and the throne of the Khilāfat of the realms of

¹ Arnold, op. cit, The Caliphate, 113-14.

² The country lying north of Afghanistan and east of the river Amū Darya or Oxus.

Hind and Sind', a monarch whose magnificance is equal to that of Solomon.

'The same claim was repeated in the reign of Shāh Jahān', in a letter to the Sultan Ibrāhīm, but at the same time the letter adds a word of praise and congratulation for the victories of the 'Khalifah of the (four) rightly Directed Khalifahs . . .' As the title Khalifah had been adopted officially by the imperial house, of course historians and men of letters had no hesitation in making use of it, and numerous examples might be given, down to the reign of Shāh 'Ālam II (1759-1806), whose authority for a considerable part of his life was not even effective within the walls of his own palace. Yet his biographer lauds him as Khalifah and Shadow of God.¹ Nevertheless, in a country like India, in which the study of the Traditions was prosecuted with so much zeal, there was always a considerable body of learned men who remained faithful to the earlier doctrine that the caliphate could belong only to the Quraysh.²

RELATIONS TO THE CALIPHATE SINCE 1800

The question of the Indian Muslim community's relation to the caliphate in more recent times has been provocative of intense agitation, throwing the whole country into turmoil, and a state of excitement which had not entirely died down even in the present day. In the absence of a ruler who could act as its immediate temporal and religious head, the Sunnī Muslim community of India has for many years past taken especial interest in the affairs of the Ottoman caliphate; and had been in the habit for many decades of mentioning the name of the Ottoman Caliph in the khuṭbah. To him they looked as the defender of the faith, since the only hope of the abiding glory and prestige of Islām was centred in him. In fact, more than once during the last hundred years, the question has arisen whether India, without a Muslim ruler, was technically dār-ul-Islām, or if it was not actually dār-ul-Harb. Accustomed as they had been for so many centuries to lean on an emperor, sultan, or local king as the support of the faith, to consider him as the leader around which they could rally, the large Muslim community of India was without a leader, and without a voice that could speak with any degree of authority. It found itself floundering among the unaccustomed vicissitudes of a new age, like a ship without a rudder. It was lost, and was trying to find itself, and in the process it began to clutch at the caliphate, for the Caliph symbolized the unity and strength of Islām.

¹ Arnold, op. cit., The Caliphate, 159-62. Joseph de Hammer, 'Memoir on the Diplomatic Relations between the Courts of Delhi and Constantinople', T.R.A.S. ii, 462-486.

² The Quraysh was the name of the Arab tribe to which Muḥammad belonged.

The story of how the Muslims of India have valiantly struggled during the last half century to create a certain amount of organization, unity and internal strength without the aid of any resident ruling authority will be told in a later chapter. But for the present we must note certain aspects of the ' Khilāfat Agitation ' which bear upon the subject.

It is well known that, as long as there was even a nominal ruler on the Mughul throne of Delhi, Muslim opinion of India was more or less indifferent to the fate of the Caliph of Constantinople. When, however, in 1853 Bahādur Shāh II reversed the practice of his predecessors, in maintaining a complete independence of the Mughul throne by making a secret avowal of allegiance to Persia, the first step was taken toward disturbing Indian Muslim complacency in regard to the caliphate. Finally, when this last of the Mughul rulers was overthrown in 1857, and the dār-ul-Khilāfat of India was empty, then Indian Sunnites, realizing the critical position of their community were forced to direct their religious loyalty to the Ottoman Caliph.¹

During the years 1877-1908 the relation of Indian Sunnīs to the Ottoman caliphate began to assume something of form and substance. The Sultan, 'Abd-ul-Ḥamīd II, was developing his doctrine of Pan-Islamism, and under the leadership of such agents as Jamāl-ud-Dīn Afghānī, who made his headquarters at Hyderabad and Calcutta during his enforced stay in India (1879-1881?), an extensive propaganda was developed.² When the Damascus-Medina railway project was being promoted by the Caliph, Indian subscriptions were sent forward from Lahore. In 1912, during the war between Italy and Tripoli, Muslim support in India was aroused on behalf of the Caliph with no little success. In 1914, however, when the Great War broke like a storm over the heads of the nations of the world, the Caliph sought to play upon the sympathies of the Muslims of India and elsewhere by declaring a jihād. It was assumed that, by thus arousing the loyalty of the Muslims of India, sufficient trouble would be created for the Allies to make an easy victory for the Germans and the Islamic hosts possible. But at this critical juncture there was a great dashing of hopes; for Muslim India, contrary to expectations in some quarters, turned a deaf ear to the Caliph's proclamation of a 'holy war'.

¹ F. W. Buckler, 'A New Interpretation of Akbar's Infallibility Decree', J.R.A.S., 1924, 608.

² See E.I., art. 'Djamāl-al-Dīn Afghānī.'

However, it was not long until a reaction began to set in. The leaders of the Indian Muslims began to be fearful of the judgment that would be meted out to Turkey in case she was defeated, and they suddenly became anxious to preserve as much of the dignity of the Caliph and of Islam as possible. Here was a problem in loyalties. They honestly desired to be loyal to the Government of India, and at the same time felt their loyalty to the Caliph, as the symbol of Islamic power and prestige, growing stronger and stronger. This second loyalty soon gave birth to the now well-known 'Khilāfat Agitation', the object of which was to help to secure as good terms as possible for a defeated Caliph in the interests of Islam and the Muslim world. The first visible result of this movement was the promise, made by the British Premier in August, 1917, that the Allies would seek to preserve the best interests of Islam in the final settlement with Turkey.

Finally, a permanent 'Khilāfat' organization was effected and a Central Committee was established in Bombay (1920), with provincial and district committees all over India. During the agitation that followed, large funds were collected, delegations were sent to Paris and London to seek to secure the best possible terms for the Caliph, while feeling in India grew intense. In their growing interest in the Caliph and the waning fortunes of the caliphate, enthusiasm ran high. Certain leaders preached the doctrine of hijrat, and declared that India was no longer a suitable place where Muslims could live and exercise the functions of their religion. Hence no less than eighteen thousand people sold their property and fled away to Afghanistan and Central Asia, all because of their devotion to the Caliph.¹ In Malabar, in 1921, a serious rebellion of the fanatical Mappillas² against the Government was started; a 'Khilāfat Kingdom' was temporarily set up, and more than a thousand cases of the forcible conversion of Hindus were reported.

The agitation continued in full force from one end of India to the other, and even won the support of the Hindus under the leadership of Mahatma Gandhi, who gave the whole force of his political power and personal endeavour to the movement. Thus matters stood, up to March, 1924, when Kemal Pasha pricked the khilāfat bubble, and rudely shattered the hopes of the Indian Muslims for the maintenance of the dignity and prestige of not only the Caliph but the Muslim world, by summarily deposing the Caliph 'Abdul-Majid, and by banishing him and his family from the Turkish nation to Europe.

Even this did not silence the agitation or the agitators. Out of sympathy for the Caliph, telegrams were sent to him from India protesting the loyalty of the Indian Muslims, and even two well-known Shī'ah leaders, the Rt. Hon. Syed Amīr 'Alī and His Highness the Āghā Khān, attempted to criticize the action of Angora and to remonstrate with Kemal Pasha by sending letters, which were published in a certain Constantinople journal. But the Turkish Government paid no attention to these protests from India, and when at last the supporters of the Caliph in India saw there was no more to be expected from that quarter, they turned their attention to attempting to support the call from Cairo for a Khilāfat Conference, with delegates from all over the Muslim world, who should confer and endeavour to agree on the election of a Caliph to act as the head of a 'League of Muslim Nations'. When this conference was finally held in Cairo, during 1926, Indian delegates were present, thus clearly indicating that the Indian Muslim belief in the caliphate as an institution still persisted, and that there was a hearty desire that there should be a visible head for Islam in whom

¹ L. F. Rushbrook Williams, India in 1920, Calcutta, 1921, 51-53.

² See p. 34f.

Muslims might centre their loyalty, and give expression to their belief in the possibility of maintaining Islam as a united world force.

MOSQUES AND CONGREGATIONS

The Muslim religious organization is not congregational in system. It resembles the Church in certain of its episcopal forms, in that it is organized from the top down, rather than from the bottom up. Thus one of the first duties devolving upon a conqueror, such as Muhammad b. Quāsim in Sind, was to arrange for the organization of the local congregation, made up of converts and the garrison. In fact, he was armed with a mandate to see that, wherever there was an ancient place or famous city or town, 'mosques and pulpits should be erected there'.¹ So, after the capture of Debul, the first city taken in Sind, he marked out a place for the Muslims to dwell in and built a mosque.² Likewise at Nīrūn he built a mosque on the site of the temple of Budh, and ordered prayers to be proclaimed in the Muslim fashion, and appointed an imām.³

Wherever these early Arab armies went they established small colonies or abodes in cities of their own construction, or in cantonments adjacent to the original cities, as in the case of Multan. Some one of the camp followers who was qualified was appointed as an imām of the mosque, and placed in charge of the instruction of converts. Much of the conquered land, also, was bestowed on sacred buildings and institutions. Such religious foundations are still to be found. The oldest of them are of course in Sind, where at one time they were so numerous that they consumed one-third of the entire revenue of the State under the Tālpūr kings.⁴

One of the duties of the kings and emperors was to build mosques within their dominions. The largest and most beautiful mosques of India have been built with the funds of the public treasuries of such monarchs as Quṭb-ud-Dīn, who started the mosque at old Delhi, famous for its minār, and who also built the Arhāi-Din-kā-Jhonprā, Ajmīr; Shāh

¹ Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 206.

² Al-Balādhurī, Futūh-ul-Buldān, E.D., I, 120.

³ Chach-nāmah, E.D., I, 159.

⁴ E.D., History of India, I, 462.

Jahān, who built the Jāmi' Masjid, Delhi, and the Motī Masjid at Agra. Likewise the Imāmbārah Masjid of the Shī'ahs, at Lucknow, was built by the King of Oudh, Āṣaf-ud-Daulah, and the Makka Masjid, at Hyderabad, Deccan, was started by Qulī Quṭb Shāh and finished by Aurangzib.

Such mosques were endowed with lands or given other income by the State; and to-day the problem of handling these pious foundations for the benefit and best good of the Muslim community has become a matter for the legislation of the various States. Mosques also have been built by individuals for their own private use. Such private chapels are to be found everywhere; and often connected with such a mosque is a private cemetery. Private endowments were assigned to such mosques, and thus their upkeep was provided for.

The first mosques were built, as has been observed, in connexion with military camps and occupation. But, as settlers from the Afghan hills began to increase in number, and as the Muslim chiefs were given grants of land for meritorious service in the government or army where they went to take up their residence, private and community mosques began to spring up. Wherever the governors resided there were mosques, and thus Muslim religious centres began to increase as the government gradually spread over the land and colonies were established. Community effort for the erection of mosques is the practice everywhere to-day. Mosque erection and repair funds are created, and some very large and fine mosques in recent times have been built in this way. Others, scattered through the villages, are poor, mud structures costing but little more than twenty-five or thirty rupees to build. In the case of some of the larger community mosques, years pass before sufficient money is raised to finish the structure; so the process of construction goes on little by little as the funds come in.¹

¹ In this connexion it is highly interesting to note that a movement was started by Khwājah Ḥasan Nizāmī, of Delhi, called the Tanzīm-i-Masjid (Organization of Mosques Movement). It had for its object the taking of a census of all the mosques in India, securing better organization of the congregations, improved arrangements for the appointment and pay of the imāms (pastors), and the erection of new mosques where they are needed. See the monthly magazine edited by Ḥasan Nizāmī, Nizām-ul-Mashā'ikh, March, 1928, p. 35.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL AND CIVIL ORGANIZATION

Great as the importance of the ruler was in the matter of his relation to the Muslims as a religious community, he was not a wholly independent executive. Islam, it is true has no state clergy; nevertheless, we find a counterpart to our Christian hierarchies in the 'ulamā¹ who were associated with the court. Islam being a Religious State, these graduates in divinity were also graduates in law. Thus it was from them that the various officers of government as well as religion were chosen, since the civil and religious functions of the State were one and inseparable. It was through these men, whose presence was indispensable to a ruler to assist in the interpretation and execution of the law, that the functions of the religious and social life of the Muslim community were carried on from the beginning. Following the invading armies, traders and adventurers from Muslim lands, came those learned in the law as well as the scriptures.

While the number of such learned men was undoubtedly small at first, as in the case of the Arab invasion of Sind, yet, as time went on, the number increased. Ultimately, through this group, Islam in India came to have a 'permanent establishment' of religious and law officers, who were able to perform the religious and civil functions required by the community. This 'permanent establishment' was largely independent of the existence of a Muslim ruler to whom the community would ordinarily look to perfect the organization, and make the necessary appointments. In a small state, it would be possible for the ruler to be personally responsible for appointments, even of *imams*² for the mosques; as we find Muhammad b. Quāsim was in the early days of the establishment of Islam in Sind. But when the business of State increased, and the community became great in numbers and was widely spread, the duties of government became more and more complex, so that it would naturally be impossible for the ruler at Delhi to take cognizance of such minor appointments. In fact, the ruler was often entirely in the hands of the learned, and how great their influence was may be judged, as Blochmann points out, from the fact that, 'of all the Muslim emperors at Delhi and Agra, only Akbar, and perhaps 'Alā-ud-Dīn Khiljī, succeeded in putting down this haughty set.'¹

¹ Men learned in Islamic 'sciences'.

² Prayer leaders or 'ministers'.

The growth of the ecclesiastical organization has been one of gradual development, and it is possible to indicate only in the merest outline just what has occurred in the past centuries. In the first place it should be noted that the responsible religious leaders, for a considerable period of the history of Islam, were either foreigners, chiefly Arabs or Persians or their descendants.

So far as the invasions of Mahmūd are concerned, we may assume that they left behind as little in the way of permanent ecclesiastical organization as of political. Lahore was the only place permanently occupied; and, since we hear of one Shaykh Ismā'īl beginning his work as a Muslim missionary there as early as A.D. 1005, it is reasonable to suppose that here also a permanent ecclesiastical organization was effected. Qutb-ud-Dīn Aybak, who was the first independent king of Delhi, must have found in his time plenty of learned men on whom to draw as suitable appointees for the administration of the religious functions of the mosques as well as the regular affairs of State, for we are told that he built nearly a thousand mosques on the sites of as many temples which he had destroyed.²

Another event of great significance for Muslim India was the Mongol invasion, which swept over Central Asia in the thirteenth century and overturned the governments of the countries to which it extended. As a result of this invasion, with its attendant horrors, men of eminence and learning were forced to leave their native lands; and during the reign of Ghiyāth-ud-Dīn Balban (A.D. 1266-1286) they came to India in large numbers, as his was the only Muslim government that was not subverted.³ 'He used to boast that no less than fifteen sovereign princes had been dependent on his hospitality.' But we are told that the number of literary fugitives was, naturally, still more considerable, including many famous authors of that age. Among these men there were many who occupied positions in the civil and ecclesiastical establishment of the government, and helped to advance the cause of Muslim learning in India, thus adding to the tradition for scholarship that was rapidly becoming part of the heritage of the community.

¹ H. Blochmann, Introduction to the 'Āin-i-Akbarī, vi.

² Hasan Nizāmī, Tāj-ul-Ma'āthir, E.D., II, 223.

³ Elphinstone, op. cit., 380.

An excellent illustration of the manner in which learned and capable men from outside India were used in effecting the organization of Islam in the early stages is afforded by the life of Minhāj as-Sirāj, the author of Tabaqāt-i-Nāṣirī. His father before him had been appointed a quādī in the army of Hindustan by Muhammad Ghūrī in A.D. 1186, and he himself came from Ghūr to Sind in A.D. 1227. He was a learned man and was placed in charge of the 'Fīrūzī College', at Uch. Later he was made Quādī (judge) of Delhi and of all Bahrām Shāh's territories. About A.D. 1246 he was appointed Principal of the Nāṣirīyah College, at Delhi. He also served as Quādī of Gwalior, and Khatīb (preacher) in the cathedral mosque at Delhi. Under İltutmish he was appointed one of the court preachers, law officer, director of preaching, and of all religious, moral, and judicial affairs.¹

As the business of government increased with the expansion of Muslim rule and the development of a Muslim community, it became necessary for the ruler to enlarge his organization. One of the earliest lists of officers of government on record is that given by Shihāb-ud-Dīn Abūll'-'Abbās Ḥamīd, of Damascus (A.D. 1297-1348), who visited Delhi early in the fourteenth century. He says that there were four main departmental officers in the central government: the Amrīyāh in charge of the army and people at large; the Sadr-i-Ḥahān, in charge of the lawyers and learned men; the Shaykh-ul-Islam, in charge of the darwīshes; and lastly there was a department in charge of dābīrs or secretaries, who were over all travellers, ambassadors, and men of letters.²

Under the Mughuls, the work of organization and administration of the affairs of the Muslim community reached its highest development. The chief officers of government were the Quādī-ul-Qudāt (Chief Justice), who was responsible for the appointment of all the quādīs (canon-law judges), the 'ādils (common-law judges), and the muftīs (subordinate law officers); secondly, there was the Dīwān (Chancellor of the Exchequer); thirdly, the Khān-i-Sāmān (Lord High Steward of government property); fourthly, there was the Sadr-uṣ-Ṣudūr, who was in charge of the waqfs (religious endowments). The Shaykh-ul-Islam was the head of the darwishes as before. Lastly, mention should be made of the officer known as the Muhtasib (Censor of Public Morals). His duties were to enforce the commands of the Prophet and put down practices forbidden by him, such as drinking, gambling, and the use of drugs. Besides he was clothed with authority to put down heretical teaching, and to punish Muslims who neglected the five daily prayers and the fast of Ramaḍān. It apparently was not an uncommon sight to see him going through the streets with a band of soldiers demolishing and plundering liquor shops, distilleries, and gambling dens wherever they were to be found, seeking to enforce the strict observance of religious rites on the Muslim populace. Sometimes his soldiers even had pitched battles with the 'bold sinners who showed fight'. During the reign of Aurangzīb one of the duties of this officer was to demolish temples that had been recently built.¹ The Muslim rulers, as a matter of course, levied the zakāt (tithes), amounting to one-fortieth of the income, on the Muslims. In theory they were obliged to spend this money for the erection of mosques, the subsidizing of saints and theological teachers, the endowment of saints' tombs and monasteries, the care of Muslim paupers and orphans, and the providing of dowries for Muslim maidens. But in later times, Muslim rulers frequently abused this trust by spending zakāt money on their own personal needs and public works.²

¹ E.D., History of India, II, 259, 260.

² Masālik-ul-Abṣār fi Mamālik-il-Amṣār, E.D., III, 576.

While the ruler relied on his 'ulamā for legal interpretation and advice in affairs of state, on some occasions he acted on his own judgment, regardless of the opinion of the wise and learned counsellors. It is said of Sher Shāh that he lived in such close relations with these advisers that he never breakfasted without the company of his 'ulamā and priests.³

¹ Jadunath Sarkar, Mughal Administration, 30 ff.

² Ibid., 19, 29, 30.

³ 'Abbās Khān, Ta'rikh-i-Sher Shāh, E.D., IV, 408.

When a judgment was needed on the punishment to be meted out to an offending Brāhman, who had caused the apostasy of Muslim women, the case was placed before 'the judges, doctors, elders, and lawyers', who rendered their decision to the Sultan.¹

But rulers were not always so reliant on their 'ulamā'; and sometimes took matters into their own hands. Akbar went so far as virtually to set aside the authority of the 'ulamā' in his reign in matters of religion, by securing from them the following written decision, which it would appear they were forced to sign:

If there be a variance of opinion among mujtahids upon a question of religion, and His Majesty, in his penetrating understanding and unerring judgment should incline to one opinion . . . and give his decree for the benefit of mankind, and for the due regulation of the world, we do hereby agree that such a decree is binding on us, and on the whole nation. Signed by the principal 'ulamā' and lawyers.²

Sometimes, when a ruler was determined and careless in his personal habits, which were contrary in many respects to the Muslim law, the learned men felt called upon to take him to task. But their remonstrances sometimes fell on deaf ears, or received only ridicule. An outstanding instance of this was the case of Jahāngīr. The traveller, Catrou, in his History of the Mughal Dynasty, gives the following description of this emperor's attitude toward some of the practices of Islam and the troubles his 'ulamā' had with him.

The fast which the Muslims observe so scrupulously for an entire month was the subject of his derision. He invited to his table the most conscientious observers of the laws of religion and inveigled them into a companionship in his excess of wine and in eating prohibited meats, the quāḍī and the imāms, who are the doctors of Muslim law, in vain admonishing him that the use of certain meats was forbidden by Al-Coran. Fatigued with their importunities, he inquired in what religion the use of drinks and food of every species without distinction was permitted. The reply was, 'In the case of the Christian religion alone.' 'We must then,' he rejoined, 'all turn Christians. Let there be tailors brought to us to convert our robes into close coats, and our turbans into hats.' At these words the doctors trembled for their sect. Fear and interest made them hold a less severe language. They all declared that the sovereign was not bound by the precepts of Al-Coran and that the monarch might, without scruple, use whatever meats and drinks were most agreeable to him.¹

¹ Ta'rikh-i-Firūz Shāhi, E.D., III, 365.

² Budāyūnī, Muntakhab-ut-Tawārikh, E.D., V, 532.

Beyond the small group of advisers who surrounded the ruler, the circle widened out first to all the provincial government centres, such as Budaun, Lahore, and the cities of the south and east, where the religious officiants would always be found in sufficient numbers to maintain high standards of knowledge and Islamic observance. But, as the circle widened still further to the smaller towns and villages, it became more and more difficult to secure properly educated men to assume the duties of imām and quādī, with the result that even to-day there are great numbers of Muslims in the villages of India who are but poorly instructed in the faith, and who, if they have a mosque at all, have only a poor affair, built of mud walls with a thatched roof, the imām of which is barely able to read the Qur'ān, and then with but little idea of what it really means.

MUSLIM LAW AS A UNIFYING FORCE IN THE COMMUNITY

While the conception of the Law (Shari'at) in its details may often be very hazily conceived and imperfectly understood, yet it wields a potent influence over the minds of the vast majority of the millions of Muslims of India and Pakistan even in the villages, and reverence for it is maintained to the best of their ability. All men, from the ruler to the slave, are alike under the Law of Islam. This Law must be obeyed or the believer will suffer not only the punishment of his community, but, what is worse, the punishment of God Himself on the Last Day.

When Islam was first introduced into India, in the eighth century, the quādīs were guided solely by the Qur'ān, as it was not until a later date that the Traditions and the Four Schools of Law were developed. As time went on, however, legal decisions were not so easily arrived at. A mass of legal literature, decisions, and commentaries on the Islamic Law Books had been collected in India, which formed a perfect maze. Through this it was an impossibility for any but the most learned to find his way. Akbar tried to simplify matters in his reign by issuing circular orders, which obviated the necessity of referring any religious, political, or fiscal matters touched on in the circulars to quādīs or muftīs.¹

¹ E.D., History of India, VI, 513, 514.

At a later period Aurangzīb went a step further, and at great expense had an enormous work on Hanafite Law decisions compiled. This compilation, which is known as the Fatāwa-i-‘Ālamgīrī, is described by Bakhtāwar Khān as follows :

As it is a great object with this Emperor that all Muslims should follow the principles of the religion as expounded by the most competent law officers and the followers of the Hanafī persuasion . . . and as there was no book which embodied them (the principles of the Hanafite sect) all, . . . therefore His Majesty, the protector of the Faith, determined that a body of eminently learned and able men of Hindustan should take up the voluminous and most trustworthy works which were collected in the royal library, and, having made a digest of them (the legal opinions contained in them), compose a book which might form a standard canon of the law, and afford to all an easy and available means of ascertaining the proper and authoritative interpretation. . . . When the work, with God's pleasure, is completed, it will be for all the world the standard exposition of the law, and render everyone independent of Moslem doctors.²

Thus matters stood until the complete dissolution of the Mughul Empire. But with the establishment of the British courts, Muḥammadan Law began to enter upon a new and interesting phase in India, which Sir ‘Abdur Rahīm describes in the following words :

It is no longer the law of the land, and is applicable to the Muḥammadans so far as its administration by the courts is concerned only by the declaration of the sovereign power.

In the early days of the British settlement the Muḥammadan Code was enforced in all its departments, but in the course of time Muḥammadan laws relating to crimes and punishments, revenues, land tenures, procedure, evidence, and in part also transfer of property, have been gradually abandoned and replaced by enactments of the legislature. Questions relating to family relations, and status, namely, marriage, divorce, maintenance and guardianship of minors, succession and inheritance, religious usages and institutions, and dispositions of property by gift (hibah), will, and waqf (pious endowment) are still governed by the Muḥammadan law, so far as Muḥammadans are concerned, and in some parts of India the Muḥammadan law of pre-emption is also recognized. Further, if any sect of Muhammadans has its own rule, that rule, generally speaking, should be followed with respect to litigants of the sect.

¹ Budāyūnī, Muntakhab-ut-Tawārikh, E.D., V, 487.

² Mir'āt-i-‘Ālam, E.D., VII, 159, 160.

The administration of the Muḥammadan as well as Hindu laws was for some time carried on with the help of Indian officers who acted as expert advisers to the courts, the Muḥammadan law officers being called Maulavis and the Hindu law officers Pundits. But for a long time the employment of such experts, being considered undesirable and unnecessary, has been abandoned.¹

It may be observed here that the Friday and 'Id prayers are regularly held all over India, and recognized to be validly held according to the Muḥammadan Canonical Law. Further, the Muhammadans of India enjoy absolute protection of person and property and religious freedom, and their laws relating to religious institutions and usages, and those governing family relations and succession and certain forms of transfer of property, are enforced by the courts. Another convincing test that India under the present form of government must be regarded as dār-ul-Islām, is that these Muhammadans who strictly follow the rules of juristic law regarding ribā (usury) do not feel themselves justified in taking interest on money advanced to non-Muslims.²

The situation in regard to the application of Muslim law in relation to the courts, which of course has nothing to do with strictly religious observances, presents a situation of peculiar interest: There have been so many accessions to the Muslim community from Hinduism that not infrequently the tribal or customary law of the converts, which obtained in their former Hindu society, has continued to be recognized as the rule by which they shall be governed, even though it may be quite contrary to Muslim law. This matter of 'Muḥammadan Law vs. Customary Law' forms the subject of a very interesting investigation by Mr. S. Roy, who makes the following observations :

The intimate connexion between law and religion in the Muḥammadan faith is very great, and consequently the authority of law is supreme among Muḥammadans. Any variation or modification of that Koranic law—especially in matters of inheritance and succession—by family or local custom is usually not permitted.³

¹ Sir Abdur Raḥīm, The Principles of Muḥammadan Jurisprudence, 37, London, 1911

² Ibid., 397.

³ S. Roy, Customs and Customary Law in British India, 378. Calcutta, 1911.

In fact, it has even been assumed by some that 'any attempt to repudiate the Law of the Koran would amount to infidelity'; that no such custom 'should be recognized by our courts, which are bound by express enactment to administer Muḥammadan law in questions of inheritance among Muḥammadans'; and that 'the law gives no opening, where parties are Muḥammadans, to a consideration of custom.'¹

Nevertheless customs and customary law have been followed again and again in certain instances, thus showing that conditions in India are such that strict interpretation of the Qur'-ānic law has neither been deemed wise nor absolutely necessary; thus setting aside the technical opinion, that for Muḥammadans the Muḥammadan law must be followed. In dealing with Hindu converts to Islam it has been held that, 'although the Muḥammadan law, pure and simple as found in the Koran, is part of the Muḥammadan religion, it does not of necessity apply to all who embrace that creed'; and that, in dealing with such converts, the principle is recognized that in questions of succession and inheritance Hindu law is applied to those converts who were originally Hindus, provided they so desire it. In fact, in Bombay, the Punjab, Oudh, and the Central Provinces, 'custom takes precedence of Muḥammadan law.'²

The courts give distinct recognition 'to the legal validity of the institution of caste, in some form or other, among Muḥammadans', and consequently in certain communal or internal matters, such as marriage and social status, the courts have held that Muslims of a particular caste must be bound by the rules of that caste.³

The Sunnī Bohoras, in Northern Gujarāt, who were originally Rajputs and were converted to Islām centuries ago, in matters of succession are still governed by the Hindu law. The Molemah Girasias, of Broach, who, originally Rajputs, were converted some centuries ago, are governed by Hindu law in matters of inheritance and succession. The Mappillas, or Moplabs, on the Malabar coast, generally follow the Moslem law except in matters of inheritance.⁴

¹ Ibid.

² Ibid., 401.

³ S. Roy. op. cit., 379-80.

⁴ Ibid., 402.

THE VARIETY OF LEGAL SCHOOLS

In respect of the different legal schools that obtain in India and Pakistan, it thus appears that there is a variety scarcely to be found in any other Muslim country. The majority of Indian Muslims follow the legal interpretations of the Ḥanafite school; there are some followers of the legal code of Imām ash-Shāfi'ī in southern India among the Mappillas. The Shi'ahs (Ithnā 'Ashariyah) of course observe their own Imāmī code, while, in addition, there is the large area among Muslim converts where customary law in civil matters may be applied. Besides, there are other sects such as the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth and the Ahl-i-Qur'ān, which have definitely set about modifying the religious law to accord with their own conceptions of legal authority in religion.

THE MODERN ORGANIZATION OF THE 'ULAMĀ'

The graduates in theology (mawlawīs or maulvīs), who are also called 'ulamā,' on whom the conduct of the religious affairs of the community depended, seem to have been devoid of any sort of organization in a formal sense at first, though they undoubtedly maintained an important form of fellowship through the ever increasing number of colleges which served as centres of control and regulation of the religious development over large areas. In fact, it is these colleges which to-day control the thinking and education of the masses through the ministers of religion who pass through them and out into the varied streams of Indian Muslim life. It is only in these modern times that an attempt has been made to organize the 'ulamā' of all India, so that they can meet and consider problems affecting the life of the Muslim community. This organization is known as the Jam'iyat-ul- 'Ulamā'-i-Hind. It has annual conferences, and central headquarters at Delhi. The body is not infrequently asked for a legal decision (fatwā) on some matter of religious duty, as, for instance, as to whether it was permissible to omit the Pilgrimage to Mecca during the struggle between Ibn Sa'ūd and King Ḥusayn for the control of the Hejāz. To-day the 'ulamā' are better organized than has ever been the case before, and consequently it is becoming possible for them to make their influence felt more widely than in the past.

THE TRADITIONAL EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM

We have already mentioned the fact that these learned men ('ulamā') have always been the backbone of the religious and legal system of Islam in India. We have seen the enormous amount of influence they wield. It now remains to consider the system by which they have been educated and trained, as well as the general system of Muslim education which has obtained from the beginning, and which has been responsible for the shaping of the community on the lines in which it has developed. The traditional system in India and Pakistan does not differ one whit from that found elsewhere in the Muslim world. There is the mosque school (maktab), where elementary principles of reading and writing are taught, as well as the reading of the Qur'ān, and the elements of religious law (fiqh). The chief aim of these schools has always been, and still is, religious teaching: to make good Muslims rather than to impart knowledge in the broader sense. The number of such schools of religious education in a country like India and Pakistan is enormous. Beyond the maktab is the madrasah (college), commonly called also dār-ul 'ulūm (abode of the sciences), where the student is kept in residence for years, studying the Islamic 'sciences' pertaining chiefly to the Qur'ān with the commentaries, the Traditions, and the Canon Law.

The need for such schools was early recognized, and it is certain that, as mosques were established from the earliest times, they were made centres for the training of converts and their children, and that the imāms were expected to employ no small part of their time in this way. Madrasahs came later, but provision was made for them quite early in the history of the spread of the religion of Islam. So far as we are able to ascertain, they were usually built by the ruler. The first record we have of a madrasah being founded dates from about the year A.D. 1191, when Muḥammad Ghūrī, during his conquest of Ajmīr, is said to have 'destroyed pillars and foundations of the idol temples, and built in their stead mosques and colleges.'¹ Muḥammad Bakhtyar Khaljī in Bengal established madrasahs after his invasion, and most of the rulers did the same. The Fīrūzī College, at Uch, founded about A.D. 1227, and the Nāṣirīyah College, founded about A.D. 1237, at Delhi, by Iltutmish, were two of the most important of these early madrasahs, of both of which Minhāj as-Sirāj, the author of the Tabaqāt-i-Nāṣiri, was the principal at different times in the thirteenth century. That even colleges were numerous in the early days there seems to be no doubt, though the testimony of some writers may be open to question, as, for example, that of Shihāb-ud-Dīn Abū'l-'Abbās Ḥamīd, who visited India in the first half of the fourteenth century, and in describing Delhi declares that he found one thousand colleges, one of which belonged to the Shāfi'īs and the rest to the Hanafīs!¹ Colleges built by rulers were always heavily endowed, often with lands; and payment for maintenance of the establishment, if not otherwise provided for, was met from the state treasury.

¹ Ḥasan Nizāmī, Tāj-ul-Ma'āthir, E.D., II, 215.

Besides madrasahs built by kings and emperors, there are some which have been built by private individuals. Of these, mention should be made of the one built in A.D. 1478-79 in Bīdar, by Mahmūd Gawan, the ruins of which are still standing, and of another, founded in A.D. 1561, near Delhi, by Māhum Anagah, the nurse of Akbar.

It is an ill wind that blows nobody good, and, as has been already noted, the devastating raids of the Mongols in Central Asia drove many learned men from their homes to find refuge in India, so that, almost from the outset, the madrasahs were well supplied with teachers of the highest learning. Here, in their new-found home, they successfully established the tradition of scholarship which had made the Muslim schools of the west, whence they had come, so famous.

MADRASAHS OF YESTERDAY AND TODAY

The largest and best of these theological schools were to be found in the chief centres where Muslim rule was established most firmly. Also these madrasahs of former days were well endowed by the rulers especially in Delhi, Agra, Lahore, Multan, Kashmir, Jaunpur, Khairabad, Patna, Ajmer, the Deccan, Madras, Gujarat, Surat and many other areas as well. However, during the time of the East India Company it appears that all these centres of Islamic learning were closed with the exception of Faranghi Mahal, Lucknow.

¹ Masālik-ul-Abṣār fī Mamālik-il-Amṣār, E.D., III, 576.

The reason given for closing being that they were deprived of their endowments in the form of free-hold landed properties, which were taken over by the 'East India Company'.¹ However, as time went on, following the disastrous events of 1857, old madrasahs were reopened, and new ones were founded.

At the present time the most important madrasah in the Muslim world, next to Al-Azhar in Cairo, Egypt, is the one located in the small city of Deoband in the Saharanpur district of Uttar Pradesh not far from Delhi. It was founded by Maulana Muhammad Qasim Nanautvi in the year 1867, just ten years after the fateful year 1857. It is today a truly international institution. Its influence reaches far and wide. As of 1953 the Shaykh-ul-Jamia, Hazrat Maulana Syed Husain Ahmad Madani, reported in a personal letter to the author that the total enrolment was 1204 students, mostly from India and Pakistan. There were also 53 students coming from 13 other countries reaching all the way from Africa to Indo-China. The influence of Deoband is strongly on the side of traditional Islam. It specializes in the teaching of the Hadith. The library of the institution is one of the largest Oriental libraries in India and Pakistan, having more than 10,000 books in Arabic, Persian, and Urdu including rare manuscripts and historical documents.

Other important madrasahs,² particularly in northern India, are the ultra-conservative Bareilly Madrasah, which trains chiefly for service in small towns and rural areas. Then there are the Faranghī Mahal and the Nadwat-ul-'Ulamā' in Lucknow which have mildly attempted to 'modernize' their curricula under the influence of Sir Syed Ahmad Khān and his associate Maulāna Muḥammad Shibli Nu'mānī.

NO PRIESTHOOD IN ISLAM

There is no priesthood in Islam, and no ordination. Yet the madrasahs are the equivalent of the theological schools of

¹ Ta'rikh Deoband, Sayyid Mahbub Rizwi, Ashok Press, Delhi, p. 71.

² Modern Islam in India, W. C. Smith, pp. 320, 321. Victor Gollancz London.

Christianity, in that their graduates go out to officiate as religious leaders in the mosques where they lead the namāz five times daily, and deliver the Friday khutba as well. The various terms: mullā, maulvī, 'ālim used for these religious leaders in India and Pakistan may be taken as the Muslim equivalent of 'Reverend', 'Doctor of Divinity' and the like. For instance, when the Aligarh Muslim University received its charter as a Central University in December 1922 the degrees of bachelor, master, and doctor of Muslim Theology were designated as mullā, maulāna, and 'ālim respectively.¹ Thus they naturally become leaders in religious matters. Muslims go to them for religious and spiritual advice. They are appointed to teach religion to children, in the neighbourhood masjid, where they also lead the congregation in prayer five times daily, and likewise deliver the Friday sermon (khutba). The influence of the mullā in the Muslim community has thus become very great in religious matters, and this gives to the various theological schools (dār-ul-'ulūm) in India and Pakistan a place of great importance.

But along with the importance of the leadership of the mullā in the community as a whole, there is also to be found a real danger which grows out of the narrow and even bigoted outlook that is often developed. This is due, of course, to the utter lack of sound philosophical and theological training which would enable him to see the point of view of others. This has been amply illustrated in Pakistan in recent years, where an outstanding leader, Syed Abū-'l Alā Maūdūdī aroused the Muslim public in Lahore to indulge in mob violence in his endeavour to force the Government of Pakistan to dismiss a very capable diplomat and member of the Cabinet... solely on religious grounds. The reason being that he belonged to an unorthodox Muslim group known as the Aḥmadiya. It is no wonder, therefore that the wise and sober elements in the Muslim community throughout Pakistan and India have come to fear the activities of the mullās, and that they have coined the word mullāism to label the ideology of these over-zealous, conservative leaders of Islam.

¹ Notes on Islam, Calcutta, Sept., 1952, pp. 102-105.

This development is very accurately assessed by a modern writer of Pakistan, Farid S. Jafri in his book *The Liberation of Islam*¹ in which he passes severe judgment on mullās as a class. He declares :

‘The mullā’s bigoted mind, instead of bringing humanity together created hatred among the people of the world, which was absolutely un-Islamic and against the purpose of the Prophet Mohammed’s message. We hear today discourses and challenges from the mullā not only against these great teachers but also against the free-thinkers and the learned men of our own religion. One mullā is terribly jealous of another To retain his overlordship, he creates a superstitious reverence for himself among the people. He belittles, as much as possible, faiths and opinions other than his. As for Islam. . . . it electrified almost the whole world. It swept through the East and West with startling speed. What happened that made it stop dead ? What happened that its very believers became ashamed to own it ? Was not the mullā responsible for this. . . . Let us liberate Islam from the clutches of the mullā.’

In a vein similar to this the great poet-philosopher, Sir Muhammad Iqbal addressed the All-India Muslim League as its president at the Lahore meeting² on March 21, 1932 as follows :

‘The superb idealism of your faith needs emancipation from the medieval fancies of theologians and legists. Spiritually, we are living in a prison-house of thoughts and emotions, which during the course of centuries we have weaved around ourselves. And be it further said to the shame of us men of the older generation, that we have failed to equip the younger generation for the economic, political and even religious crisis that the present age is likely to bring.

‘The whole community needs a complete overhauling of its present mentality in order that it may again become capable of feeling the urge of fresh desires and ideals. The Muslim has long ceased to explore the depths of his own inner life, and is consequently in danger of an unmanly compromise with forces which he is made to think he cannot vanquish in open conflict.’

This then is the ‘mullā peril’, which indicates the urgent need for radical revision of the curriculum of the madrasahs which will provide for their students a more realistic and appreciative understanding of the times in which they live. Only by so doing can the mullā be fitted in spirit and in method to meet the demands of this new day for the community he serves ' In the name of Allah ! '

¹ Notes on Islam, Calcutta, Sept. 1952, p. 104.

² “ ” “ ” 105.

In fact there is one hopeful sign on the horizon which indicates that perhaps a new day is dawning for the training of the Muslim ' clergy '. It is a growing dissatisfaction with the mullās among the modern educated Muslims. The suggestion is made that there should be a department of theology connected with each modern Muslim University similar to that connected with the Aligarh Muslim University, so that there may be developed a type of religious leader whose training, knowledge, and spirit may be more in keeping with the times in which seventh century Islam now finds itself.

We are not surprised that, in the middle of the nineteenth century, Sir Syed Ahmad Khān found it necessary to enter a protest against the Muslim community's continuing to fetter itself with the exclusively oriental curriculum taught in the schools, and proclaimed far and wide his gospel of modernization. What does strike us as being peculiarly interesting is that a Muslim sovereign, as devoted to orthodoxy as Aurangzīb was, should have criticized the classical curriculum of his day. The statements attributed to him by Bernier are so penetrating and discriminating that we shall give them just as Aurangzīb is supposed to have delivered them to his former teacher, who repeatedly sought an appointment from the Emperor.

Pray what is your pleasure with me, Mullah Ji, Monsieur the Doctor ? . . . Do you pretend that I ought to exalt you to the first honours of the State ? Let us then examine your title to any mark of distinction. I do not deny you would possess such a title if you had filled my young mind with suitable instruction. Show me a well-educated youth, and I will say that it is doubtful who has the stronger claim to his gratitude, his father or his tutor. But what was the knowledge I derived under your tuition ? You taught me that the whole of Franguistan (i.e. Europe) was no more than some inconsiderable island, of which the most powerful monarch was formerly the King of Portugal, then he of Holland, and afterward the King of England. In regard to the other sovereigns of Franguistan, such as the King of France and him of Andalusia, you told me they resembled our petty Rājās, and that the potentates of Hindustan eclipsed the glory of all other kings ; that they alone were Humayons, Ekbars, Jehan-Guyres, or Chah-Jehans ; the Happy, the Great, the Conquerors of the World, and the Kings of the World ; and that Persia, Usbec, Kachguer, Tartary, and Cathay, Pegu, Siam, and China trembled at the name of the Kings of the Indies. Admirable geographer ! Deeply read historian ! Was it not incumbent upon my preceptor to make me acquainted with the distinguishing features of every nation of the earth ; its resources and strength ; its mode of warfare, its manners, religion, form of government, and wherein its interests principally consist ; and, by a regular course of historical reading, to render me familiar with the origin of states, their progress and decline ; the events, accidents or errors, owing to which such great changes and mighty revolutions have been effected ? Far from having imparted to me a profound and comprehensive knowledge of the history of mankind, scarcely did I learn from you the names of my ancestors, the renowned founders of this empire. You kept me in total ignorance of their lives, of the events which preceded, and the extraordinary talents that enabled them to achieve their extensive conquests. A familiarity with the languages of surrounding nations may be indispensable in a King ; but you would teach me to read and write Arabic, doubtless conceiving that you place me under an everlasting obligation for sacrificing so large a portion of time to the study of a language wherein no one can hope to become proficient without ten or twelve years of close application. Forgetting how many important subjects ought to be embraced in the education of a Prince, you acted as if it were chiefly necessary that he should possess great skill in grammar, and such knowledge as belongs to a Doctor of Law ; and thus did you waste the precious hours of my youth in the dry, unprofitable, and never-ending task of learning words !

Were you not aware that it is during the period of infancy, when the memory is commonly so retentive, that the mind may receive a thousand wise precepts, and be easily furnished with such valuable instruction as will elevate it with lofty conceptions, and render the individual capable of glorious deeds ? Can we repeat our prayers, or acquire a knowledge of law, and of the sciences, only through the medium of Arabic ? May not our devotions be offered up as acceptably, and solid information be communicated as easily, in our mother tongue ? You gave my father, Chah-Jehan, to understand that you instructed me in philosophy ; and, indeed, I have perfect remembrance of your having, during several years, harassed my brain with idle and foolish propositions that seldom ever enter into the business of life. . . . O yes, you caused me to devote the most valuable years of my life to your favourite hypotheses, or systems, and when I left you, I could boast of no greater attainment in the sciences than the use of many obscure and uncouth terms, calculated to discourage, confound, and appal a youth of the most masculine understanding ; terms invented to cover the vanity and ignorance of pretenders to philosophy ; of men who, like yourself, would impose the belief that they transcend others of their species in wisdom, and that their dark and ambiguous jargon conceals many profound mysteries known only to themselves. If you had taught me that philosophy which adapts the mind to reason, and will not suffer it to rest satisfied with anything short of the most solid arguments; if you had inculcated lessons which elevate the soul and fortify it against the assaults of fortune, tending to produce that enviable equanimity which is neither insolently elated by prosperity nor basely depressed by adversity, if you had made me acquainted with the nature of man; accustomed me always to refer to first principles, and given me a sublime and adequate conception of the universe, and of the order and regular motion of its parts;—if such, I say, had been the nature of the philosophy imbibed under your tuition, I should be more indebted to you than Alexander was to Aristotle, and should consider it my duty to bestow a very different reward on you than Aristotle received from that Prince. . . .¹

THE PILGRIMAGE (HAJJ)

One factor of vast importance for strengthening the communal religious consciousness of Indian and Pakistani Muslims, and for maintaining contacts with the rest of the Muslim world, has been the annual pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina. There are no records of the earliest pilgrim journeys from India, and it is not known how long it took before the traffic began to assume large proportions. Sūrat, in Gujarāt, in the Mughul period, was used as the pilgrim port. In fact, traces of the old pilgrim route still exist in the town and harbour, and there is a street in Sūrat called the 'Mecca Road' to this day. The number of ships that set out from here annually must have been considerable, for Sher Shāh (A.D. 1539-1545), who had the welfare of his people at heart, is said to have regretted that he had not been able to 'build two fleets of fifty large vessels each as commodious as sarāīs (hotels) for the use of the pilgrims from India to Mecca'.²

In Akbar's time the pilgrimage became a matter for further royal concern. So, after Gujarāt was annexed (A.D. 1572), it was decided that the dignity and importance of his government demanded that 'every year one of the officers of his court should be appointed Mīr Hājī, or Leader of the Pilgrimage, to conduct a caravan from Hindustan, like the caravans from Egypt and Syria, to the holy places. The design was carried out, and every year (for five or six years) a party of enlightened men of Hind . . . received provision for their journey from the royal treasury, and went under an appointed leader from the ports of Gujārāt to the holy places.'¹

¹ Bernier, Travels in the Mogul Empire, 155 ff. Tr. V.A. Smith, Oxford, 1914.

² Ni'amat Allāh, Ta'rikh-i-khān Jahān Lodi, E.D., V, 108.

At the present time the Pilgrimage arrangements for travel are under the careful supervision of the governments of Pakistan and India, respectively. Every effort is made to see that the travel requirements of the pilgrims are adequately provided. The facilities for travel today are varied. Most of the pilgrims go by sea to Jiddah, or to Basrah at the head of the Persian Gulf. Embarkation takes place at the ports of Chittagong, Calcutta, Bombay and Karachi. Some go by air, and some even venture to go overland all the way by bus ! In 1954 the Pakistan Foreign Office permitted the Pak Hajj Transport Company to book 300 passengers for the land journey from Rawalpindi to Mecca, by way of Quetta, Zahidan, Isfahan and Baghdad !²

The total number of persons making the pilgrimage from year to year varies according to circumstances. Before 'partition' in 1947 it was reported that as many as sixty thousand a year made the journey to Mecca, most of them going by sea from Calcutta, Bombay and Karachi. Even as recently as 1948, arrangements were made for as many as 10,000 from India and about the same number from Pakistan !³ Since then the number was considerably reduced for a time due to the currency and quota restrictions. The latest figures available show that in 1954, 19,000 Pakistani pilgrims, and 6,000 from India made the journey to Mecca,⁴ while 'in 1956 about 21,000 pilgrims from Pakistan alone were expected to perform the Haj !'⁵

From this it will be seen how very important the pilgrimage is for the Muslims of Pakistan and India. Returned pilgrims are found in villages, towns and cities from one end of this great area to the other. They are inevitably the promoters of orthodoxy, and return to their homes to receive the

¹ Nizām-ud-Dīn Ahmad, Ṭabaqāt-i-Akbarī, E.D., V, 391.

² The Muslim World, July-Oct., 1954 p. 280.

³ Notes on Islam, Calcutta, 1948, p. 75.

⁴ Moslem World and the U.S.A., January, 1955, p. 40.

⁵ Pakistan News Release, London, 1956.

eneration and respect of their community. Pilgrims are recruited from all classes. They are both men and women, peasants and landlords, editors of newspapers and magazines, as well as the illiterate ; persons with university training and degrees, and individuals high in government service. Before the partition of India in 1947 Her Highness the Begam Sahiba of Bhopal made the pilgrimage ; and more recently, in the year 1956, the Pakistan Prime Minister, Mr. Muhammad Ali, accompanied by his wife, performed the Haj. On the eve. of their departure by plane for Karachi, the Prime Minister sent to His Majesty King Saud of Saudi Arabia the following telegraphic message,¹ which is evidence of the supreme importance attached to the Pilgrimage by the Muslims of Pakistan and India :

‘ As I leave this sacred land I should like to say how deeply grateful I am for the most generous hospitality and great kindness which your Majesty has extended to me, my wife and other members of my party. Throughout our two weeks’ stay in the Hejaz we have received great consideration and kindness from all members of your Majesty’s Government. In particular we were most impressed by the excellency of the arrangements made to enable us to perform the Haj. Considering the magnitude of the problems involved in handling some hundreds of thousands of persons performing the Haj, this was no easy task. All those who were deputed to look after us have therefore earned not only our gratitude, but our admiration.

‘ The performance of the Haj, which brings together Muslims from all corners of the world, is in itself a great and unforgettable experience. This visit has been remarkable for another reason also : my talks with your Majesty, His Royal Highness, the Crown Prince and other members of your Government have left a profound impression on me of the strong spiritual ties that bind our two countries and of the esteem and fraternal friendship in which your Majesty, the members of your Government and your people hold Pakistan and her people. I hope I was able to convey to your Majesty and to your Government something of the high esteem and affection in which my Government and the Pakistan people hold your Majesty and the people of your country. The fraternal feelings between our peoples are centuries old and have deep spiritual roots. In recent times they have been further strengthened. May they continue to grow stronger and deeper. May they animate the entire world of Islam and may it prosper and take its rightful place in the comity of nations. Amen.’

¹ ‘ Pakistan Daily News ’, 31st July, 1956. Information Dept., High Commission for Pakistan, London.

In 1926 an effort was made which, it was hoped, would make the pilgrimage an affair of unusual importance. Among the delegates to the Muslim World Congress, held in Mecca from June 7th to July 5th of that year, were a number from India. This group proposed that henceforth representatives from each of the then thirty-three Muslim countries and areas, including India, should meet there annually at the time of the pilgrimage. Although this annual Muslim World Congress did not materialize as hoped, none-the-less the pilgrimage continues to be one of the foremost agencies for promoting the vitality of Muslim culture and religion among the more than one hundred million Muslims of Pakistan and India along with the rest of the Muslim world.

CHAPTER V

SHI'AHS AND MAHDAWIS

THE diversity of Islam in India and Pakistan constitutes one of its most interesting phases, and offers ample testimony to the multitude of divisive influences that have been at work through the history of its development. In this respect it suffers from the difficulties of sectarian weakness, just as Christianity does. Of course, the vast majority of this extensive Muslim community belong to the orthodox fold of Sunnī Islam, but, apart from this group, there is found here the largest community of Shi'ahs outside of Persia, where the peculiar faith of the Shi'ah is the established religion.

The number of Shi'ahs in India and Pakistan cannot be definitely given, owing to the fact that the Census returns are by no means complete, in spite of efforts to secure accurate tabulations.¹ It is, however, variously estimated at from four to six millions, and is certainly less than ten per cent of the whole Muslim population. The undoubted reason for the difficulty of collecting the exact figures through the Census is that Shi'ahs are permitted, by their religious doctrine of taqiyyah (guarding one's self), to conceal their sectarian affiliation, in order to secure immunity from persecution from their hereditary opponents, the Sunnis. However, at the present time, it would seem that more cordial relations exist between the two communities than ever before, and we are told that there are numerous signs that Shi'ahs reveal their identity far more readily than used to be the case. One curious fact, however, in connexion with the 1911 Census in Peshawar, was that the Shi'ahs recorded were far in excess of their actual numbers, and the reason assigned for this was that if the Sunnī enumerators had a grudge against anyone residing in the block with which they had to deal they would be likely to record him as a Shi'ah by sect.²

¹ C.I.R., 1921, I, pt. I, 119. ² C.I.R., 1911, N.W.F.P., para. 125.

Muslims of Shī'ah persuasion are to be found in practically all parts of India and Pakistan though they are less numerous in the regions of Bengal, Assam, Bihar and Orissa than elsewhere in proportion to the Sunnis. They are found chiefly in south India, where their principal centre is Hyderabad; in western India where the chief centres are Bombay and Surat; in northern India and the Punjab, Lucknow being their most important centre, not alone of this area, but of all India and Pakistan.¹

Shī'ahs belong to two of the unorthodox groups that have become famous in Muslim history, which are designated as the Ithnā 'Ashariyah (followers of twelve Imāms) and the Sab'iyah (followers of seven Imāms). To the former group most of the Shī'ahs of India and Pakistan belong. Each group will be dealt with in its place. It is not our purpose to state the doctrinal differences between the Shī'ahs and the Sunnis in any detail, for these are available in the various accounts that have been given by numerous writers; we shall therefore confine our remarks to the matters of distinctly local importance, and shall endeavour simply to describe the Shī'ahs in their historical setting, and their present relationship to the rest of the Muslims of the area.

The term 'Shī'ah' connotes 'party', and is used to designate all those Muslims who support the claim of 'Alī, the fourth Caliph, as the first and rightful successor to the Prophet. This 'Alī 'party' came into existence certainly not later than the period of discussion over the caliphate which immediately followed the death of Muhammad. It held that the right of succession to the Imamāte, or caliphate, of the Muslim community was vested in 'Alī and his lineal descendants, since through his wife, Fāṭimah, a daughter of the Prophet, they were all of the Prophet's family. The ideas and influence of the 'Alī party spread to different parts of the Muslim world in the early centuries, and, as time went on, divisions and subdivisions developed one after another. The leading branch of the Shī'ah, as has been stated, is known as the Ithnā 'Ashariyah (the Twelvers). They hold that there have been in all twelve successors of Muhammad, and that the twelfth one, who mysteriously disappeared, did not die but is still living. He is concealed under Divine care, and is called the Hidden Imām. They also expect him to return to earth in the character of the Mahdī, whose coming is prophesied as a sign of the last days. Another important group of the Shī'ahs came into existence after the death of the sixth Imam, Ja'far as-Şiddīq. They recognize his son, Ismā'il, as the seventh Imām, with whose death they regard the Imāmate closed. They likewise assign to him a Mahdī character. This group is known as the Sab'iyah (Sevens). These are the two groups which are to be found in India. The whole matter of the development of the Shī'ah in its theological and political aspects is very involved, but perhaps enough has been said to indicate the fundamental lines of cleavage that exist between the two Shī'ah groups in India, and between them and the orthodox Sunnīs. We now turn to consider them both in more detail, whence they came, how they are organized, and their main activities.

¹ Hollister, J. N., The Shi'a of India, Luzac & Co.

THE ITHNĀ 'ASHARĪYAH OR IMĀMĪS

The Muslim conquerors of India were all Sunnīs, as also were the emperors who ruled at Delhi and Agra. Nevertheless, Shī'ah influence from Persia was at times very strong, and many Shī'ahs found their way into India, and established communities throughout the land. The introduction of the sect in different parts of the country came about in a variety of ways, which we shall now attempt to describe.

The armies of the kings and emperors of the north, up to the time of the Mughuls, were largely recruited from foreign countries. These, composed of Mongols, Persians, Turks, Georgians, Circassians, Calmucs, and other Tartars, were mostly Shī'ahs.¹ We hear especially of these troops being employed in southern India, for the establishment of the Bahmanī Kingdom in the Deccan in A.D. 1347, and in connexion with the factional strife that prevailed between the Sunnīs and Shī'ahs until the larger kingdom was disrupted and divided into several rival states, many of whose rulers were ardent Shī'ahs. Thus it happened that the Shī'ah religion became established throughout the Deccan.

¹ Elphinstone, op. cit., 476.

INFLUENCE OF PERSIAN RULERS AND SAINTS

To what extent Persian rulers may have had a hand in encouraging the establishment or maintenance of these Shī'ah kingdoms of the south we may never know fully, but that direct Persian influence of one sort or another was present there cannot be the slightest doubt. This is brought out very clearly in the case of the conversion of Ahmad Shāh I, the ninth king of the Bahmanī dynasty, who was the first Shī'ah to rule in India (A.D. 1422-1436). His conversion was apparently only a personal matter, and he made no attempt whatever to establish his adopted religion. He seems to have become a Shī'ah some time before A.D. 1430, and the circumstances of his conversion are so suggestive of the Shī'ah influence from Persia, which must have been very active, that I shall give them somewhat in detail. The king seems to have heard of the Shī'ah saint, Shāh Ni'mat Allāh, of Mahan, near Karmān in south Persia, and sent a mission to him, composed of Shaykh Ḥabīb Allāh Junaydī, Mīr Shams-ud-Dīn of Qūm, and others to act as proxies, and to demand admission for the king to the circle of the saint's disciples. This favour was accorded the king, so he sent a second mission to ask that the Shaykh should send one of his sons to India to act as his spiritual guide. Instead, however, Ni'mat Allāh sent his grandson, Mīr Nūr Allāh; but on the death of the saint, in A.D. 1430, his son, Khali Allāh, with two other sons visited India, and the sons seem to have taken up permanent residence in the Deccan.¹

Following the break-up of the Bahmanī kingdom, as we have seen, the rulers of the rival dynasties took an active interest in laying foundations for the establishment of the Shī'ah religion in south India. The first of these was Yūsuf 'Ādil Shāh, of Bijāpūr, who is said to have enjoyed living in Persia, where he became a zealous Shī'ah.² On his accession to the throne, in A.D. 1490, he declared the Shī'ah faith to be the established religion of the state. Evidently, however, it was not all smooth sailing, for we learn that 'by a proceeding so unexampled in India, he caused much disaffection among his own subjects, and produced a combination of all the other Muhammadan kings against him'.¹ At Ahmadnagar, the second ruler of the Nizām Shāh dynasty, Burhān by name, openly professed the Shī'ah religion, when he ascended the throne in A.D. 1509, and made good its establishment in the state.² In A.D. 1512, just three years later, when the Turk, Qulī, founded the Quṭb Shāh dynasty at Golkonda, he likewise found no difficulty in introducing the Shī'ah faith into his dominions, which formed the beginning of the present Hyderabad State.

¹ Sir Wolseley Haig, 'The Religion of Ahmad Shāh Bahmanī', J.R.A.S., 1924, 73.

² Najm-ul-Ghanī Khān, Madhāhib-ul-Islām, 438 f.

There may be nothing more than a coincidence in the fact that the Shī'ah kingdoms of the Deccan and the Shī'ah Ṣafawid dynasty of Persia were all founded within a comparatively short time of each other, toward the close of the fifteenth and the beginning of the sixteenth centuries. This much is clear, however, that Shāh Ismā'il, who was the first ruler of the Ṣafawid dynasty, took great interest in India. In the year A.D. 1511, when Muzaffir II ascended the throne of the petty kingdom of Gujarāt, he was greeted with a splendid embassy from Shāh Ismā'il, who paid a similar compliment to most of the Indian princes, with the undoubted design of seeking to win favour for the Shī'ah religion, which he was desirous of introducing.³

That the Shī'ah rulers of the Deccan had far more than casual relations with the Shī'ahs of Persia is abundantly shown by the fact that frequent embassies arrived at the court of Ṭahmāsp, from the princes of the southern part of the peninsula. These were sent especially from Nizām Shāh, of Ahmadnagar; Quṭb Shāh, of Golkonda and Hyderabad; 'Alī 'Ādil Shāh, of Bijāpūr, also sent embassies and presents and assurances of friendship. The latter went so far as to inform the Shāh that he had ordered the khutbah of the Shī'ahs to be read in all the mosques of his dominion in the illustrious name of His Majesty the King of Persia. The king was so delighted that he expressed his satisfaction by presenting all manner of royal gifts to the ambassadors.⁴

¹ Elphinstone, op. cit., 757. ² Ibid., 758.

³ 'Alī Muḥammad Khān, Mir'āt-i-Ahmadi, 219.

⁴ Ta'rikh-i-'Ālam-ara-i-'Abbāsi, in Jawhar's Tadhkirat-ul-Wāqiāt, 126.

Encouraged, no doubt, by the apparent success of the establishment of the Shī'ah religion in south India, it is not surprising that Shāh Ṭahmāsp should take advantage of the forced visit of the Emperor Humāyūn to his dominions to make a daring effort to compel his royal guest to embrace the Shī'ah religion. This occurred in the year A.D. 1544, when Humāyūn was a refugee in Persia, whither he had fled after being driven from his throne at Delhi by the daring Afghan, Sher Shāh.

Ṭahmāsp was a shrewd and clever ruler, and he entertained no small hopes that, through the good offices of Humāyūn, he might be able to bring about in the north of India what had been accomplished in the southern territories; and thus, with the Shī'ah faith established in India as in Persia, he no doubt anticipated that his country might exercise political dominion over her as well. At any rate, Humāyūn was confronted with no theory but a fact. Ṭahmāsp insisted that Humāyūn must adopt the religion of the country he had entered, or take the consequences. Finally, after persistent refusal on the part of Humāyūn, Ṭahmāsp sent a quādī to him with three papers, and was told that he might choose which he would sign. Finally, after indignant refusals, he was persuaded to choose one of the papers, which he read out in apparent assent to its contents. It appears that the paper must have contained the Shī'ah confession of faith, together with a promise to introduce it into India, and a clause relating to the cession of the frontier province of Quandahār. Humāyūn is said to have adopted the Shī'ah mode of reciting the public prayers, and to have further indicated his change of faith by making a pilgrimage to the tomb of Shaykh Ṣafī, at Ardabīl, in north-western Persia, near the Caspian Sea.¹ On Humāyūn's return to India it was, of course, impossible to carry out the wishes of Ṭahmāsp, and to all intents and purposes he died a well regarded Sunnī. To what extent the perfervid Shī'ah enthusiasts among the Persian rulers may have employed missionaries of their own has not, so far as I know, been discovered; but from the above overt acts it is clear that they must have fostered a propaganda of some sort.

¹ Jawhar, op. cit., 65 ff.

SHI'AHS AT THE MUGHUL COURT

Further Shi'ah influence was to be found also at the Mughul court in the presence of Bairam Khān and other Persians.¹ This worthy gentleman was one of the favourite noblemen of the Persian Shāh Tahmāsp, who became one of Humāyūn's officers. To him, also, was entrusted the care of the youthful Akbar, who made him his first minister. It is little wonder that, on Humāyūn's return from Persia, the orthodox 'ulamā' of the court looked first to their own safety, and that they kept at a discreet distance until after the fall of Bairam Khān. No doubt much of the influence that shaped Akbar's religious experience is to be found in his early contact with this ardent Shi'ah, who was his first minister and guardian. But whatever his religious convictions or those of his associates, he would not allow the Shi'ah religion to become supreme. Nevertheless, Shi'ah influence continued to honeycomb the Muslim community, and as late as 1853 we learn that the impotent and nominal ruler, Bahādur Shāh II, actually made secret avowal of allegiance to Persia and the Shi'ah faith.²

LATER DEVELOPMENTS

The cause of the Shi'ah has been promoted also by the rulers and nobility of certain Native States, in comparatively recent times. Sa'ādat Khān, originally a merchant from Khurāsān, came to Delhi, and in the first quarter of the eighteenth century rose to a military command. He was made Governor of the province of Oudh, and ultimately was the founder of the dynasty of the kings of Oudh. Under their patronage and influence Lucknow became one of the most renowned centres of the Shi'ah faith in India, and to-day the Mahārājā of Mahmūdābād may be said in some sense to continue the tradition of royal patronage to the faith that it formerly enjoyed to such an unrestricted extent. In Rampur and Murshidabad such of the Nawabs as have professed the Shi'ah faith have given it protection, and honoured it with their active support.

¹ See also Najm-ul-Ghanī Khān, Madhāhib-ul-Islām, 441.

² F. W. Buckler, 'A New Interpretation of Akbar's Infallibility Decree', J.R.A.S., 1924, 608.

In fact, the influence of these Shī'ah rulers has been so great that the rise of the Shī'ah community around their courts, and within their sphere of influence, is found to date from their coming to power. This is particularly true of Oudh, where, after repeated investigation and inquiry, it is clear that the Shī'ah community has been largely recruited from the original Sunnī Muhammadans. Shī'ahs were naturally favoured above others in the sight of the rulers, so, for the sake of personal advancement, the change has often been made. One well-informed person, part of whose family is Shī'ah, gives it as his opinion that most of the Shī'ahs of Oudh are the result of conversions from Sunni Islam which have taken place in the last two hundred years. Additional evidence of this is found in the fact that such of the Rampur rulers as have been of the Shī'ah persuasion have been led to this decision through the influence of the Lucknow Shī'ahs.¹

MISSIONARIES

That there were Shī'ah missionaries who were zealous in their work, appears from two very striking instances recorded by Muslim historians. In the latter half of the fourteenth century, during the reign of the pious Fīrūz Shāh III, the ruler himself relates the manner in which they carried on their work and the way in which he dealt with them.

Some Shī'ahs, also called Rawāfid, had endeavoured to make proselytes. They wrote treatises and books, and gave instruction and lectures on the tenets of their sect, and traduced and reviled the first chiefs of our religion. I seized them all and convicted them of their errors and perversions. . . . Their books I burnt in public, and so by the grace of God the sect was entirely suppressed.²

Three other missionaries are mentioned as having come to India during the reign of Akbar, in the sixteenth century. They were three brothers from Gilān, near the Caspian Sea, by name Ḥakīm Abū'l-Faṭḥ, Ḥakīm Humāyūn, and Ḥakīm Humān. Besides, there was one Mullā Muhammad Yazdī. 'All attached themselves,' says Budāyūnī, 'to the Emperor, flattered him, adapted themselves to his changes in religious ideas, spoke derogatorily of the Companions of the Prophet, and tried hard to make a Shī'ah of him.'¹ It would be interesting to know what other efforts they made to spread their faith, and with what success.

¹ Najm-ul-Ghani Khān, Madhāhib-ul-Islām, 444.

² Fūṭuhāt-i-Fīrūz Shāhī, E.D., III, 377.

Hakīm Abū'l-Fath, at any rate, was associated with one of the most learned and clever Shī'ah theologians that ever came to India. This was Sayyid Nūr Allāh bin Sharīf al-Husaynī, al-Mar'ashī Shūshtarī, who is known as the Shāhid Thālith of the Ithnā 'Ashariyah Shī'ahs. Sayyid Nūr Allāh came to India from Shūshtar, in Persia, about the year A.D. 1587, during the reign of Akbar. He was well received by Hakīm Abu'l-Fath Gilānī, on whose recommendation he was appointed by the Emperor to be the Quādī-ul-Quḍāt of Lahore. He accepted the appointment on condition that he would be permitted to give his decisions according to any one of the four legal systems (madhhab) of the Sunnīs. As a matter of fact he was suspected from the very first by the orthodox 'ulamā of Akbar's court as being a dangerous person in matters of doctrine, and he was closely watched. During his leisure hours as Quādī he wrote in defence of Shī'ah doctrines, and has left several important treatises. The most important of these in Persian, the Majālis-ul-Mu'minīn, he finished while in Lahore in the year A.D. 1604. It is said that this book was copied by a man who had been employed by the 'ulamā of Jahāngīr's court, to win the confidence of the Quādī; and on the basis of the heretical evidence so secured he was condemned to death. He suffered martyrdom by whipping because of activity for his faith in the year A.D. 1610, and was buried at Agra, where his tomb is greatly revered by all Imāmīs.²

REFUGEES AND ADVENTURERS

Still another means of the introduction and spread of the Shī'ah religion in India was the shelter which the country afforded to those who were driven from their own lands by the Mongol invasion of the thirteenth century A.D., in the reign of Balban at Delhi; for the horrors of that catastrophe 'drove men of eminence from the countries to which it extended, and, Balban's being the only Muḥammadan government that was not subverted, his court was filled with illustrious exiles of that religion'.¹ Among these were princes and literary fugitives. Knowing how the ferment of Shī'ahism was working throughout the Muslim lands, it cannot but have happened that some of these refugees were followers of that path.

¹ Muntakhab-ut-Tawārikh, E.D., V, 524.

² Mīrzā Muḥammad Hādī, Maulvī, Shahid Thālith, 15 ff., Lucknow.

Lastly, mention should be made of the courtiers from Persia, men of literary genius, and adventurers who came to India to try their fortunes. Especially during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, thanks to the generous patronage of Humāyūn, Akbar, and their successors, a great number of the most talented Persian poets were attracted to Hindustan. Budāyūnī mentions one hundred and seventy who had mostly been born in Persia. Shiblī says that fifty-one came in Akbar's time, and Sprenger supplies a long list.² Most of these, if not all, were undoubtedly Shī'ahs. In many cases the emperors gave grants of land to their government officers, and in this way Shī'ah communities have been established in many places, such as Amroha, in the Moradabad district. It is also interesting to note that practically all of those Shī'ahs belonging to the Ithnā 'Ashariyah group are of Persian and Turkish descent, and they mostly affect the prefix Sayyid, which indicates that they claim lineage in the family of the Prophet.

MINOR PECULIARITIES

The Indian Ithnā 'Ashariyah does not offer any marked peculiarities as compared with people of this sect in other lands. Their chief theologians are known as mujtahidīn, which title is conferred on those of sufficient merit, either by a Shī'ah ruling prince or by the people themselves. While the prevailing legal practices among Muslims have been Sunnī, particularly of the Ḥanafite school, yet practices peculiar to Shī'ahs long ago began to grow up in certain localities which were subject to Shī'ah governors in former times. Naturally, as the local ruler became more and more independent of the supreme head at Delhi and the Shi'ah governments became hereditary, the number of adherents to the faith of the ruler increase, and Shi'ah laws and customs would more and more come into force. In some cases it would even happen, as in Lucknow, that the sect of the local ruler finally came to outnumber that of the distant and nominal head at Delhi. In the beginning Sunnī law was administered; but finally, as in the case of the last kings of Oudh, the Shi'ah law supplanted the Sunnī law and was made the law of the state or province. But since the British occupation, in 1857, the practice has been to apply none but Shi'ah law to Shi'ahs, and this only in respect to such subjects as marriage, divorce, preemption, gifts, pious endowments, wills, and inheritance.¹

¹ E. G. Browne, Persian Literature in Modern Times, 165. Cambridge.

² Browne, op. cit., 165; also Sprenger, Catalogue, King of Oudh MSS., I, 46, 55 ff.

RELATIONS BETWEEN SUNNĪS AND SHĪ'AHS

In India, as elsewhere, the 'Sunnī-Shi'ah' relations have always been more or less strained, and Shi'ahs have been obliged at times to practise their doctrine of taqīyah (pious concealment of their true faith) in order to avoid fanatical persecution from the Sunnīs. Even in the time of the liberal Akbar, when Shaykh Mubārak, father of the famous Abū'l Faḍl and his brother Fayḍī, turned Shi'ah, as a result he was greatly persecuted, and was obliged to fly with his family from Agra.² Prince Shujā', the son of Shah Jahan, was a Shi'ah, and so was regarded with aversion by the orthodox. At the same time his brother, Aurangzīb, who became a model for Muslim orthodoxy, is said to have detested the Shi'ahs almost as much as he did the Hindus.³

An interesting occasion for difficulties between the two sects arose during the reign of Shāh 'Ālam (A.D. 1759-1806), which caused a widespread disturbance, extending from Lahore to Ahmadabad. An order was given that the word waṣī (heir) should be used among the attributes of the Khalifah 'Alī in the khuṭbah (Friday sermon). This was too much of a Shi'ah innovation, as it tended to indicate that 'Alī was the true successor of the Prophet, and it was met with violent opposition in Lahore, Agra, and Ahmadabad. In the latter city 'the crowd killed the khaṭīb (preacher) of the chief mosque'. Finally, after much agitation on the part of the religious leaders, the Emperor ordered that they should return to the form used in the reign of Aurangzīb.¹

¹ N. B. E. Baillie, A Digest of Muḥammadan Law, Imāmiyah. London, 1875.

² Elphinstone, op. cit., 533.

³ Ibid., 672.

The Muḥarram celebrations usually offer an opportunity for a display of fanatical outbursts between the two communities, owing chiefly to the curses which the Shī'ahs call down upon the heads of the Sunnī caliphs who preceded 'Alī; but in recent years the feeling between the two communities has considerably softened, and one seldom hears of riots occurring between them. This has been brought about in part, no doubt, by the efforts of the Government to have the Muḥarram processions of the Sunnīs and Shī'ahs move at different times and by different routes on the days when the *ta'ziyahs*² are to be buried. Modern education, too, is helping to break down the old prejudices, though undoubtedly the old hostility remains among some of the more fanatical sections.

Evidence of the spread of Shī'ah influence among Sunnīs is common, and it is probable that nowhere else in the world of Islam are the Sunnīs so largely imbued with Shī'ah ideas and customs as in India and Pakistan. Although it is a purely Shī'ah custom to observe the Muḥarram celebrations for the first ten days of the sacred month, many Sunnīs are found to observe the ceremonies with the same regularity as the Shī'ahs do. Some even go to the extent of cursing the first three caliphs, and then join in the procession of the ta'ziyahs on the tenth of Muḥarram in memory of the martyrdom of Ḥusayn with as much enthusiasm as any Shī'ah. Sunnī literature includes popular poems and stories glorifying the martyrdom of Ḥusayn and cursing the inglorious name of Yazīd, which clearly shows how Shī'ah influence has penetrated the length and breadth of the Sunnī community.

Though the Shī'ahs are reported to be on the decrease numerically, they are far from being an unimportant community. One of their best-known leaders was the late

¹ Khāfi Khān, Muntakhab-ul-Lubāb, E.D., VII, 420 ff, 427 ff.

² The ta'ziyah is a representation or model of the tomb of Ḥusayn at Karbala, carried in procession at the Muḥarram time.

Rt. Hon. Syed Amīr 'Alī, of the Calcutta High Court, who was the author of valuable expository and apologetic works on Islam in English, and who was an outstanding rationalist of the reform school among the Shī'ahs. His books, The Spirit of Islam and The Ethics of Islam, are highly regarded by all the modern Islamic reformers of India. A new effort at propaganda has, within recent years, been manifested by the establishment of a school or seminary for the training of preachers at Lucknow, called the Madrāsāt-ul-Wā'izīn, under the distinguished patronage of the Maharajā of Mahmūdābād, a leading Shī'ah nobleman of Lucknow.

To promote the interests of the community throughout India, the 'All-India Shī'ahs Conference' was organized in 1907, and has regard to the social and educational uplift of the sect. Among other developments has been the establishment of the Shī'ah College, at Lucknow. Shī'ahs are inclined to deplore the fact that in many respects they are considered outside the pale by Sunnī organizations; and one of them, writing in a periodical of north India, expressed his views under the heading, 'Are Shī'ahs not Moslems, that they are forced to have their own separate conference to consider the interests of their community?' In many things, however, they do act together. The Muslim University at Aligarh has special provision made for the religious teaching of its Shī'ah students. One of the curious developments of the caliphate agitation in India was that the late Rt. Hon. Syed Amīr 'Alī joined the Āgha Khān, who is the head of the Ismā'ili Khojahs, in sending letters to the Kemalist Government at Angora, Turkey, protesting against the abolition of the Turkish Caliphate and the deposition and banishment of the Caliph, though neither of these gentlemen, nor the Shī'ahs whom they represented, owed the slightest religious allegiance to the Sunnī Caliphate, to which, indeed, in theory they were opposed. The reason for their willingness to assist their Sunnī compatriots in this case was that they felt that in the abolition of the Turkish Caliphate, the world of Islam, of which they were a part, would suffer a loss in prestige.¹ For the most part, however, the Ithnā' Ashariyah, numbering about five millions, finds it necessary to maintain a separate communal existence, which extends to worship, places of worship, certain festivals such as Muḥarram and Nau-roz, and matters pertaining to the civil code as mentioned above.

¹ The Muslim Outlook, Lahore, Jan. 12, 1924.

THE SAB'ĪYAH OR ISMĀ'ĪLĪS

The history of the Ismā'īlis is of great interest, not only because of the variety of plot and counterplot which it presents, and the extremely esoteric nature of its doctrines, but especially because its tenets are a vital force in certain parts of India and Pakistan. We have already shown how this sect arose as an offshoot from the main branch of Shī'ahs after the death of the sixth Imām, Ja'far as-Ṣiddīq (A.D. 765), through his son, Ismā'il, while the main branch of the Shī'ahs reject Ismā'il and claim that his brother, Mūsa Kāẓim, was the true seventh Imām. Because of persecution, the sons of Ismā'il were forced to leave Medina and escaped into Syria. From their foreign retreats their descendants sent out missionaries (dā'īs) to preach the esoteric (bāṭini) doctrines, which are based on allegorical interpretation of the Qur'ān. A son of one of these missionaries, 'Abd Allāh by name, became the head of the social-religious movement known as the Quarmaṭians, which was ultimately used to support the Fāṭimid anti-Caliphate in Egypt (A.D. 910-1171). The adherents seem to have remained fairly well united until the death of the Fāṭimid Caliph Mustanṣir, after which they divided into two parties, each supporting a son of the deceased as the rightful head of the Ismā'īlians. One party supported al-Musta'lī and the other Niẓār. Representatives of both groups are found in India. The Niẓārīs are represented by the Khojāhs¹ of Bombay and the Punjab, and the Musta'līs by the Bohrāhs of western India.²

The Quarmaṭians, or Carmathians, seem to have been the first of the heretical groups to reach India; but eventually they were followed by members of both the other sects. Consequently, in what follows we shall take up the Quarmaṭians first, and then pass on to consider their successors.

¹ For the Khojāhs, see p. 101 f.; and for Bohrāhs, see pp. 97 ff.

² E.I., arts. 'Ismā'īliya' and 'Quarmaṭians'.

THE QUARMAṬIANS

The Quarmaṭians were the forerunners of unorthodox Muslim sects in India¹ as early as the latter part of the ninth century A.D. When they were expelled from Iraq and Egypt because of their political rebellions, many of them fled to Sind for refuge and a group of them from al-Aḥsā, in Baḥrain, founded a principality at Multan. There must have been a considerable number of them, for they seem to have made converts, and obtained a certain amount of political control of the old Arab province of Sind. Maḥmūd of Ghazni finally put an end to the three centuries of Arab influence there by replacing the Quarmaṭian prince, Abū'l-Fath Lodī, of Maṣḍūrah, with a Sunnī Muḥammadan.² In their zeal they destroyed the famous idol at Multan, which Muḥammad b. Quāsīm had allowed to remain, massacred the priests, and converted the temple into a mosque to take the place of the one built by the Umayyad conquerors, which they closed to show their hatred. After Maḥmūd had subdued the Quarmaṭians in the eleventh century, he re-opened the ancient mosque and abandoned the new one.³

This effort on the part of Maḥmūd, however, did not put an end to the activities of the mulāḥids (heretics), as the Quarmaṭians were called; for in A.D. 1175 we find that Muḥammad Ghūrī once again had to deliver Multan out of their hands. Still later, in A.D. 1237, during the brief reign of the Sultana Riḍīyah, they come to notice in a riot at Delhi; which outbreak evidently aroused a determined effort to suppress the heresy, for we do not find the Quarmaṭians mentioned, as such, after this date. This last conflict is graphically described by one of the Muslim historians, who relates that 'the Quarmaṭians and heretics of Hindustan, being seduced by a person with some pretensions of learning named Nūr Turk, flocked to him in large numbers from all parts of Hindustan, such as Gujarāt, Sind, the environs of the capital, and the banks of the Jumna and Ganges. They assembled in Delhi,

¹ For an account of their doctrines and history, see The Encyclopaedia of Islam, II, 768 ff. Luzac & Co.

² E. D., History of India, I, 459. Ibn Athir, Kamil-ut-Tāwārikh, E.D., II, 248.

³ Ibid., 470.

and declared open hostility against the people of Islam, led by Nūr Turk, who used to say that the learned Sunnis were Nasībīs, (enemies of 'Alī) and Murjīs (that is, those who think faith sufficient and works unnecessary). He endeavoured to inflame the minds of the common people against the followers of the doctrines of Abū Ḥanīfa and Shāfi'it but finally, after an attack on the Jāmi' Masjid on a Friday in March, A.D. 1237, when many Muslims were killed, they were routed, and every heretic and Quarmaṭian sent to hell and the riot quelled.¹

While the suppression of the riot may have resulted in suppressing the name of Quarmaṭians, it is certain that it did not suppress the extreme Shī'ah views which they held, and which have from time to time made their appearance in one form or another. It would appear certain that the Roshanīyah sect, which arose in the Punjab and on the north-west frontier during the time of Akbar, was related to these heretical antecedents. Others probably tended to become more moderate in their views, and became absorbed in the regular Shī'ah group. These early 'Alid refugees have left evidences of their flight into Sind in the many Sayyid families found in that province. Also, in East Pakistan, there are found many Sayyids who trace their ancestral settlements to the Indus valley. One tribe in Baluchistan still shows evidence of its origin in the name Quarmaṭī.²

That the Quarmaṭians of India had connexion with their refugee brethren in other lands, and that they were actively engaged in spreading their doctrines and winning Hindus as well as Muslim converts to their faith, is indicated in a very interesting notice by Elliot, who says,

In the sacred books of the Druzes we find an epistle of Muktāna Bahā-ud-Dīn, the chief apostle of Ḥamzah, and the principal compiler of the Druze writings, addressed in the year A.D. 1032 (?) to the Unitarians of Multan and Hindustan in general and to Shaikh Ibn Sumār Raja Bal in particular. . . . This indicates that some of the Sumera tribe, including the chiefs, had affiliated themselves to the Quarmaṭians . . . and that the Quarmaṭians of the Indus valley were in relation and correspondence not only with those of Persia and Arabia, but with the Druzes, who adored Ḥākim the Fāṭimide Caliph of Egypt as a God.³

¹ Minhāj as-Sirāj, E. D., II, 335 f.

² E.D., History of India, I, 481, 492.

³ Ibid., 491.

This also agrees quite well with the relations sustained to-day between the present Ismā'ilians of India and other members of the group in Arabia, Syria, and Central Asia.

THE BOHRAHS

The name, Bohrah, belongs to a group of Muslims that is found chiefly in Bombay and Baroda, most of whom are Ismā'ilians. They number one hundred and fifty-three thousand, three hundred and sixty-three,¹ and are mostly Hindu converts, though some few claim to be of Arabian lineage. The term, Bohrah² is said to be of Gujarāti origin, from the word vohorvu, meaning to trade, hence Bohrah means trader. As such it is not used exclusively for Muslims, as there are a few Hindus, also, who use it as a caste designation.

The Bohrahs constitute that branch of the Indian Ismā'ilians which supports the succession of al-Musta'li as successor of al-Mustansir in the line of Fāṭimid Caliphs and head of the Ismā'ilī faith. The sect in India had its origin in the work of missionaries who came from Yaman, in Arabia, whither the head of the sect had to flee from Egypt after the fall of the Fāṭimid dynasty. There is disagreement as to who was the first missionary to India. Some claim that it was one 'Abd Allāh, from Yaman, who landed in Cambay in A.D. 1067 and carried on a very active propaganda; others assert that it was Muhammad 'Ali, who died in A.D. 1137, and whose tomb is still revered in Cambay as that of the first missionary. The work of winning converts went on peacefully under the Hindu rājās, who did not seem to object; but the Bohrahs were cruelly persecuted at times during the occupation of the Sunnī kings, who ruled from A.D. 1396 to 1572.³

The modern history of the Bohrahs begins with the year A.D. 1539, when the head of the sect, Yūsuf bin Sulaymān, who had long lived in Yaman, Arabia, came to India and took up his residence at Sidhpur, to the north of Pātan, in Baroda. Up to this time it had been necessary for his Indian followers to go to him for the payment of their tithes and the settlement of their difficulties, but since the coming of Yūsuf bin Sulaymān they have had a head of their own, whom they call their dā'ī and whom they venerate as the representative of the Imām-uz-Zamān (Leader of the Age).

¹ C.I.R. 1921.

² See Hollister, The Shi'a of India, pp. 265-305. op. cit.

³ R.M.M., X, 471.

There are two main branches of the Bohrāhs. This division came about through a schism that occurred in the year A.D. 1588, after the death of Dā'ūd bin 'Ajab Shāh, who was the head of the sect resident in Yaman. The Bohrāhs, of Gujarāt, promptly chose Dā'ūd bin Quṭb Shāh as their head, but the Ismā'īlians of the Yaman would not recognize this choice, and set up one Sulaymān, whom they claimed Dā'ūd had nominated before his death. Sulaymān then came to Gujarāt to make good his claims, which were rejected by all but a few. He finally died at Ahmadabad, where his tomb and that of his rival, Dā'ūd bin Quṭb Shāh, are to be found. The two branches resulting from this schism bear the names of their respective founders, and are called the Dā'ūdī and Sulaymānī Bohrāhs. The head of the Dā'ūdī branch resides at Sūrat, and that of the Sulaymānī in the Yaman. The latter has a representative who lives in Baroda.¹

There is a small number of Bohrāhs known as the Ja'farīs, who are descendants of Dā'ūdīs. They became Sunnīs in the time of Muẓaffar Shāh (A.D. 1396-1411) and succeeding governors of Gujarāt. These Ja'fari Bohrāhs take their name from one Sayyid Ahmad Ja'far Shīrāzī, of the fifteenth century, whose descendants still officiate as spiritual guides. Besides these three groups of Bohrāhs which have been mentioned there are two other minor communities, the product of secession. One is known as the 'Alīyahs, which separated in A.D. 1624 from the Dā'ūdīs to follow 'Alī bin Ibrāhīm as their high priest instead of Shaykh Abd-ul-Tayyib, who had been chosen previously.

Lastly there are the Nāgoshīs, who dissented from the 'Alīyahs in the eighteenth century. They derive their name from the belief that flesh-eating is a sin, 'nā' meaning 'no', and 'gosh' or 'gosht' meaning 'meat'.²

The Dā'ūdī Bohrāhs have a well organized community,

¹ E.I., art. 'Bohorās'; also Muḥammad Najm-ul-ghanī khān, Madhāhib-ul-Islām, 312 ff.

² R.M.M., X, 480 ff.

which has four grades of mullās besides the Dā'ī al-Muṭlaq, or Chief Mullā. These are called the ma'dhūn, mukāsir, mashāikh, and mullā. A college was founded in 1809, at Sūrāt, for the training of aspirants to religious leadership and it is still in a flourishing condition. The Mullāji at Sūrāt, has a large income from the tithes of his followers, as well as from the waqfs (pious endowments) which are under his control, and which he is supposed to administer for the benefit of his followers. Recently he was brought to trial by some responsible persons of his community in Bombay, who charged him with mismanagement of the waqfs.¹

The peculiar religious beliefs of the Bohrāhs are for the most part very obscure, as a systematic practice of concealment obtains and little has been published. Of the printed books, the Ṣahīfat-uṣ-Ṣalāt in Arabic and Gujarāṭi exists; and among the unprinted books there are the Dā'im-ul-Islām and al-Haqā'iq, both of which set forth the doctrines and rites of Shī'ah Islam, and give accounts of Bohrāh dā'īs and their sayings.² Since most of the members of the community are Hindu converts, they have clung to their Hindu customs in many matters. They have not yet adopted the Muslim law of inheritance, and so keep their women from inheriting property. They both give and take interest on loans, and at the Diwālī festival they excel the Hindus in their illuminations, and like them also, change their old account books for new ones at that time. However, they do not associate with Hindus, and will not take sweetmeats from their hands. If a Hindu dhobi washes their clothes they purify them by sprinkling holy water on them.

They also keep themselves distinct from other Muslims. They have separate mosques which they call jamā'at-khānas, and their own exclusive cemeteries. Their calendar is two days ahead of the ordinary Muslim calendar. They observe none of the ordinary distinctions of 'caste' such as Sayyid, Shaykh, Mughul and Pathān. The Dā'ūdī Bohrāhs offer only three prayers a day—morning, noon and night—instead of the usual five, and they do not meet on Fridays for united worship, as other Muslims do. The Bohrahs use the Gujarāṭī language, with which they have mixed many Arabic words.

¹ Indian Daily Mail, Feb. 25, 1925.

² E.I., art. 'Bohorās'.

Reforms are at work in this community as in others. Some time ago a High Court action was brought against the Dā'ī al-Mutlaq, or head of the Dā'ūdī Bohrahs, by some members who desired to dispute his claim to absolute power over his followers, regarding such claims as not in keeping with the spirit of the times. Those who instituted the action were excommunicated from their community.

Recently also a number of young men started a 'Young Men's Bohrah Association', the objects of which are 'to benefit their community by progress and reform, which are now rendered necessary consistently with the times'. From conversation with their secretary, I gather that the means by which they hope to achieve this end is by the establishment of hospitals, high schools and other similar institutions.

Some of the representative men of the community have attained to eminence in Indian life, notably Badr-ud-Dīn Tayyibji a Sulaymāni Bohrah, who was judge of the High Court of Bombay. Many of them are very wealthy.

THE KHOJAHS

The Khojahs¹ are a small community of Ismā'īlian Shi'ahs, found chiefly in the Punjab, Sind, Cutch, Kathiawar, and other parts of western India and Pakistan, particularly Bombay and Poona. According to the Census of 1921 they numbered one hundred and forty-six thousand, one hundred and nine. They are an important part of the scattered remnants of the adherents of Niẓār, son of al-Mustanṣir, Fāṭimid Caliph of Egypt, and are consequently 'cousins' of the Bohrahs, since the latter are adherents of the sect that supported the succession of al-Musta'lī, brother of Niẓār. The spiritual ancestors of the Khojahs were those Ismā'īlians known as the Assassins, whose headquarters were at Alamūt, in Persia, and whose founder was Ḥasan bin Ṣabbāḥ (d. A.D. 1124). After their overthrow by the Mongol Hūlāgū Khaṇ, in A.D. 1250, they were widely scattered and driven from place to place. Some of the sect survived in Syria, while the remainder migrated to other parts of the world, and are to-day found in Zanzibar, East Africa, Persia, Oman, in the Hindu Kush region of Central Asia, on the north-west frontier of Pakistan, and in Afghānistān.

¹ Hollister, The Shi'a of India, pp. 351-412. Luzac.

There is a tradition preserved by the Khojahs that their first dā'i who came to India as a missionary was one Nūr Satāgar or Nūr-ud-Dīn. It is barely possible, therefore, that the riot at Delhi, in A.D. 1237, which was led by one Nūr Turk and which included certain heretics other than Quar-maṭians, was an expression of the activity of some of the dispersed Ismā'ilians from the region of Alamūt; and indeed that this Nūr Turk was none other than the first Ismā'ilian missionary of the Khojahs mentioned above.¹ This is the view held by D. Menant.² Nūr-ud-Dīn carried on a successful propaganda in Gujarāt, and is said to have won many followers from among the Hindus by reason of his miracles, for which he had a great reputation. The second missionary is said to have been Shams-ud-Dīn, who came from Iraq and settled at Uch, about eighty miles south of Multan; while the third, Ṣadr-ud-Dīn, came to Sind from Khurāsān in the fifteenth century, and finally died at Uch. His tomb, however, built by the Khojahs in the Bahāwalpur State, is at Trinda Gorgej.

Most of the Khojahs are Hindu converts, and their dā'is made special efforts to adapt their bātini (esoteric) teachings to the Hindu beliefs. Ṣadr-ud-Dīn (fifteenth century A.D.) wrote the Das Avatār (the Ten Incarnations), for the use of his converts in Sind. He endeavoured to demonstrate that 'Alī was in fact the long-expected tenth incarnation (avatār) of Vishnū. Even to-day this book is one of the most sacred of the literature of the Khojahs. Another book, written in Persian by Āghā 'Ābd-us-Salām toward the end of the sixteenth century, for the use of his Indian disciples, is called Pandyād-i-Ṣavān-mardī. This has been translated into Sindī and Gujarāti, and is also regarded as personifying the twenty-sixth Khojah pīr (saint).³

The Khojahs are divided into two well-defined groups, which, for the sake of convenience, are designated the Punjab

¹ See pp. 43 and 96.

² R.M.M., XII, 220.

³ R.M.M., XII, 224 ff.; E.J., art. 'Khodja'; Najm-ul-Ghan ī Khān, Madhahib-ul-Islām, 334 f.

Khōjāhs and the Āghā Khāṇi Khōjāhs. The latter is by far the larger group, for it includes not only all the others outside the Punjab, but the Āghā Khāṇ is recognized as the head of the other scattered groups outside India as well, which have already been referred to. The late Āghā Khāṇ, Sulṭān Muḥammad Shāh, of Bombay, claimed to be a lineal descendant of Rukhn-ud-Dīn Khurshāh, last Grand Master of Alamūt, who claimed descent through Nizār, son of Mustanṣir, from Ismā'īl the seventh Imām, and great-great-great-grandson of the Prophet's cousin and son-in-law 'Ali.¹

For more than three centuries the head of the Āghā Khāṇis was a resident of Persia, with whom his scattered followers maintained direct personal touch. To him they sent their offerings, and many even went to visit him. Finally, however, political events forced him to leave that country. Crossing the deserts of Baluchistan in 1840, he came to Sind, where he was well received by the Nizārite members of the Tālpūr family. Since 1845, however, Bombay has been the headquarters of the Āgha Khāṇ, with the exception of a couple of years, when he resided at Poona and Bangalore. The late Āghā Khāṇ III,² who was grandson of the one who was a refugee from Persia, lived a luxurious life, and spent much of his time in Europe and England, where he took great delight in racing his own horses. Having received a modern English education himself, he was one of the foremost leaders in Muslim reform movements and efforts to improve the condition of the Muslim community. To this end he co-operated wholeheartedly with the promoters of the Muslim University, Aligarh, to which institution he made generous donations from time to time. He was a strong supporter of British rule in India, and presented his views in a book called India in Transition, which appeared in 1918. He was the first president of the All-India Muslim League, which was founded in 1906. It is very difficult indeed to realize that this modern, cultured Indian prince was the spiritual successor of the 'Old Man of the Mountain'³ who was the terror of the Lebanon; and to believe that he was almost worshipped as an incarnation by hundreds of thousands of devotees in many countries, who supported him in luxury by their gifts, and counted themselves fortunate if they ever had the opportunity to kiss his hand.

¹ E. G. Browne, A Literary History of Persia from Firdausi to Sa'adi, 210.

² J. N. Hollister, The Shi'a of India, 371 ff. Luzac.

³ This was the title applied to the head of the Assassins.

This community is organized, writes A. Yūsuf 'Alī in the article on the Khōjāhs in the Encyclopaedia of Islam, in the form of a complete fiscal centralization round the sacred person of the Aghā Khān, but of complete congregational independence in administrative matters, including even questions of excommunications. . . . The officers (of the Jamā'at-khānas) are the mukhī (headman, treasurer, chairman) and the kāmaria (secretary, accountant). They are sometimes appointed by the Aghā Khān, but are frequently elected. Offerings for the Imām (i.e. the Aghā Khān himself) are collected through them; these comprise the fixed Dasonḍh or tithe (the Momnās split from the community in the sixteenth century, mainly on their refusal to pay this) and various minor dues on special occasions, either recurring (as the festival of the new moon) or occasional (as the rites of birth, marriage, burial, etc.).¹

Other secessions from the Āghā Khānī community have taken place, the most important of which occurred in the last century. At that time a considerable section endeavoured to have the whole group turn Sunnī, while in 1901 a small number of modernists seceded and joined the Ithnā 'Ashariyah, or 'regular' Shī'ahs.² More recent evidence of dissatisfaction within the community is apparent in the existence of the 'Khōjāh Reformers' Society', of Karachi. In August, 1927, it published an 'Open Letter,' addressed to H.H. the Āghā Khān which gave a detailed account of its grievances and the reforms desired. It contains a strong protest against the selfish worldliness of the Āghā Khān himself, and pleads for reforms in the management of the community which will improve its neglected condition. The statement closes with the following summary of the demands made on His Highness :

That you will disclaim and repudiate all divine honours paid to you which rightly belong only to the True God Almighty.

That you will change commercial Jamā'at khānas into mosques where prayer only might be offered.

That you will arrange for Islamic instruction being imparted to one and all of the followers of Your Highness.

¹ E.I., II, 961.

² E.I., II, 961; Najm-ul-Ghanī Khān, Madhāhib-ul-Islām, 334 ff.

That you will absolutely stop and refuse acceptance of all offerings whatsoever, pecuniary or kind ; and lastly,

That you will be good enough to abolish the councils and repeal the rules altogether, for we respectfully point out that this is the indefensible right of the community as an autonomous body, which alone is competent to govern itself and manage its own affairs.¹

In spite of the above criticisms of his community, the Āghā Khān has continued to have himself weighed against silver or gold on his birthday each year. In the year 1953-54 he was weighed against platinum both in Dar-es-Salaam, Tanganyika and in Karachi, Pakistan. His weight was 215 lbs. In each case the 'weighing' was done by counting each 14 lbs. the equivalent of one ounce of platinum ! At the weighing in Karachi on February 14th, 1954, it was stated that the Rs. two and one half millions thus raised would be used for the economic uplift and welfare of the Ismailis in Pakistan.

There is an active Āghā Khān Press in Bombay, which publishes books, tracts and periodicals in Gujarāti and English. A recent Year Book of the Khojahs was a beautifully printed edition of several thousand copies describing the activities of the Āghā Khān and his community.

The Punjab Khojahs do not recognize the Āghā Khān as their head, so curiously enough, they turn to the pīrs of the Sunnite Chishtī and Quādirī Orders for practical religious leadership. In most other respects their religious beliefs and practices are identical with the other Khojahs.

It is reported that some 40,000 caste Hindus became members of the Āghā Khānī Khojahs in the period 1900-1914.²

The most renowned Khojah, whose name will 'live forever' in the annals of his community is that of Muhammad Ali Jinnah, a resident of Bombay, the last president of the Muslim League, the Quaid-i-'Azam of the Muslim people, the founder of Pakistan, and its first Governor-General !

THE ROSHANĪYAH SECT

About the middle of the sixteenth century there arose a new sect on the north-west frontier, which bore a direct relation to the Ismā'ilians and was evidently an offshoot from them. This was known as the Roshanīyah, because of the title, 'Pir Roshan', which the founder, Bāyazīd, took for himself. This title means 'Guide of Light', but his enemies in derision called him 'Pir Tārik' or 'Guide of Darkness'. Bāyazīd was born about the year A.D. 1525, in the city of Jullundur, in the Punjab, but his father, Shaykh 'Abd Allāh, soon was compelled to fly with his family to his ancestral home at Kanīguram, in Wazīristān. After he was grown he came under the influence of an Ismā'ilī heretic, by the name of Mullā Sulaymān, upon whose teachings he finally came to base his new doctrines.¹

¹ An Open Letter to H.H. the Āghā Khān, 26, 27.

² Notes on Islam, Calcutta, March 1954, p. 37.

³ Hollister, The Shī'a of India, p. 146.

In common with all Muslims who are the founders of new sects, Bāyazīd felt called to be a divine messenger. He retired to a cave near Kanīguram, and passed through several stages of austerities which he imposed upon himself. He assumed the title, 'Pir Roshan' or 'Miyān Roshan', and issued a call to the people to join his way of life. He claimed to have received direct revelations from God, and that Gabriel descended to him. Thus he assumed the character of a prophet, and ordered his adherents to practise religious austerities also. His followers rapidly grew in number, and he established his authority in the regions of the Sulaymān hills and the Khyber. This caused trouble for the Mughul government, and Akbar was at last compelled to send a force to bring the Roshanīyahs into submission. This was accomplished in A.D. 1587, and there was no more trouble until A.D. 1611, when there was another revolt at Kābul, which was at last put down with great slaughter.²

The doctrines of Pir Roshan, which are regarded as peculiarly objectionable, and which show an intimate relationship to Ṣūfī and Ismā'ilian doctrines, with special reference to their promulgator as the manifestation of divinity, are set forth by Ākhūnd Darwīzah as follows :

1. God is all in all, and all existing objects are only forms of his deity.

2. The great manifestations of divinity are Pirs, or religious teachers, who are forms of divinity, or rather deity himself. In the spirit of this opinion, Bāyazīd said to his followers, ' I am your Pir, and your God '.

¹ Dābistān, tr. J. Leyden, Asiatic Researches, XI, 406 ff, London, 1812.

² Elphinstone, op. cit., 517; E.I., art. 'Bāyazīd'.

3. The sole test of right and wrong is obedience to the Pir who is the representative of divinity, or rather deity itself ; and therefore, right and wrong are not attributes of a Pir, and the greatest of all sins is disobedience to a Pir, which is disobedience to deity himself.

4. Those who will not receive the precepts of a Pir are in the situation of brutes, to kill which it is in some cases meritorious, and in all cases lawful ; or in that of dead men whose property naturally devolves to the living, and may therefore be legally plundered at pleasure by all true believers.

5. Human souls transmigrate into other bodies, and reappear in other forms, and such terms as ' resurrection ', ' day of judgment ', ' paradise ' and ' hell ', are only métaphors to express mundane things.

6. The Koran and Hadīs (Islamic Traditions) are not to be interpreted literally or according to the apparent sense, but according to the mystic, secret, or interior meaning. The ordinances of the law have therefore a mystical meaning, and are ordained only as a means of acquiring religious perfection.

7. This mystic sense of the law is only attainable by religious exercises and the instructions of a Pir ; it is the source of religious perfection ; and this perfection being attained, the exterior ordinances of the law cease to be binding, and are virtually annulled.¹

The Roshanīs have all but ceased to exist ; the only remnant being found among the Afrīdīs of the North-West Frontier Province. Descendants of Bāyazīd still live in Jullundur, and it is thought that the doctrines of the sect have greatly influenced Muḥammadan beliefs throughout the north-west. There are a number of songs still sung by faqīrs in the Punjab which commemorate the miracles of Shaykh Darwish, and other members of Pir Roshan's family².

THE MAHDAWĪ DOCTRINES

The heretical Mahdawī movements, which have affected India during the past centuries, have been productive of certain sectarian developments which we shall now notice briefly. The doctrine of the expected Mahdī is based on certain alleged prophecies of the Prophet regarding the advent of a mujaddīd, or restorer of the faith. The movement seems to have had its origin in Badakhshān, beyond Afghānistān, and to have spread from there over Persia and India. The doctrine was closely connected with the completion of the first thousand years of the Muslim era, so that in the last century preceding the close of the first millenium the learned everywhere in India were discussing the question.

¹ J. Leyden, ' The Rosheniah Sect ', Asiatic Researches, XI, 420 f.

² Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 337.

Finally, the Mahdī movement took on a definite form through the teaching of one, Mīr Sayyid Muḥammad, of Jaunpur, in the latter part of the fifteenth century A.D.¹ He had much in his favour for the initiation of such a movement. He was a descendant of the Prophet, and bore his name, which fulfilled the prophecy that 'Muḥammad Mahdī shall be of my family'. He next saw in the fall of Jaunpur a sign that the latter days had come; he claimed to work miracles, and announced that a voice from heaven had whispered to him, 'Thou art the Mahdī'. His followers increased in number, but he was finally driven to Gujarāt, where he found an adherent in Sultan Maḥmūd I (A.D. 1458-1511). He finally went on a pilgrimage to Mecca with some of his followers, to the great relief of Maḥmūd; but he was driven away from there also. On his return he is said to have announced to his followers that he had received a revelation to forsake his Mahdī doctrines. He wandered from place to place, and finally died at Farāh, in the valley of the Helmand, north of Baluchistan.²

The memory of this Mahdī is still revered in the district of Kirmān, Baluchistan, where there is a sect called the Zikrī (Dhikrī) whose adherents are mostly of the nomad population. They are sometimes spoken of as Dā'irewāle, that is, 'people of the circle', because of a peculiarity which characterizes their practice on the night of Laylat-ul-Quadr. On that occasion they erect a circle of stones (dā'irah), within which they practise their heretical ritual.³

Another person claiming to be a Mahdī, and a forerunner of the Jaunpūrī Mahdī, is mentioned by Fīrūz Shāh III (A.D. 1351-1388), who gives a graphic account of the way he ¹ An excellent account of this Mahdī is given by Najm-ul-Ghani Khān in his Madḥahib-ul-Islām, 695 ff.

² H. Blochmann, Introduction to Ā'in--Akbarī, iii.

³ J. Horovitz, Monograph on the Dā'ire-wāle Sect; Goldziher, Vorlesungen, 284 ff.

regarded him, and the manner in which he dealt with the pretender :

There was in Delhi a man named Rūkn-ud-Dīn who was called Mahdī because he affirmed himself to be the Imām Mahdī, who is to appear in the latter days, and to be possessed of knowledge by inspiration. He said he had not read or studied under anyone, and that he knew the names of all things, a knowledge which no prophet had acquired since Adam. He pretended that the mysteries of the science of letters had been revealed to him in a way never made known to any other man He led people astray into mystic practices ; and perverted ideas by maintaining that he was . . . the Prophet of God. The elders brought the facts of the case to my attention, and he was convicted of heresy and error. The doctors of the Law said he was an infidel, and worthy of death for having spread such vile and pernicious ideas among the people of Islam . . . so they killed him, with some of his supporters and disciples, and the people rushing in tore him to pieces and broke his bones into fragments. Thus was his iniquity prevented.¹

In the Mysore State also, at Channapatam, is to be found another group known as Dā'ire-wāle, who likewise appear to be spiritual descendants of this same Mahdī from Jaunpur. In this case they seem to have originated from the preaching of one Sayyid Aḥmad, who was born in A.D. 1444 in Gujarāt, and who evidently came in contact with Muḥammad Jaunpūrī, but as he went southward to the Nizām's Dominions he assumed the rôle of Mahdī himself. He is said to have died in A.D. 1504. The watchword of his followers was 'Imām Mahdī came and went away : he who does not believe this is an infidel'. They have had many conflicts with the orthodox Sunnis. They have no regular mosque, and worship only in a jamā 'at-khanah, or assembly room.

Another Mahdī appeared during the reign of Islām Shāh (A.D. 1545-1552). He was a darwīsh known as Shaykh 'Alāī. He was a resident of Bayana, near Agra, and, having been joined by another like-minded person by the name of Miyān 'Abd Allāh, who had been under the influence of Muḥammad, of Jaunpur, openly professed to be a Mahdī. He collected six or seven hundred heads of families and migrated to Khawaspur, near Jodhpur. Finally he was summoned to Agra before Islām Shāh, and expelled to the Deccan. As he did not cease to proclaim his peculiar doctrines he was again summoned to Agra, and ordered to renounce his claims to being a Mahdī. As he refused he was finally 'condemned by the 'ulamā as a heretic, ordered to be scourged, and at the third blow expired'.¹

¹ Futūḥāt-i-Firūz, Shāhī, E.D., III, 379.

These sects are also known as Ghayr-Mahdawī (i.e. without a Mahdī), because of the fact that they regard the Mahdī as having come, and so do not look for another. Some of them have at times been wildly fanatical toward others, and have caused much disturbance.

The Mahdī movements have been characterized by features that are significant. They have been led by men of education, who have possessed great oratorical power as preachers, and could draw multitudes to them. Secondly, they assumed a definitely hostile attitude toward the learned men who held office at the emperor's court. Thirdly, they undertook to be reformers of Islam, being mujaddids. In this connexion it should be pointed out that the two Mahdīs of the nineteenth century, Sayyid Aḥmad, of Rae Bareli, and Mīrzā Ghulām Aḥmad, of Quādiān, have much in common with these earlier Mahdī movements; but, as they have left a deposit of a more modern character, with elements which are still active, we have reserved discussion of them until a later chapter.

¹ 'Abd Allāh, Ta'rikh-i-Dā'udi, E.D., IV, 501; Blochmann, Introduction to A'in-i-Akbari, iii ff.

CHAPTER VI

RELIGIOUS ORDERS

ŞŪFISM

ISLAM, like Christianity, has its monastic orders and saints, the underlying basis of which is the mystic interpretation of the religious life known as Şūfism. It is no part of our present plan, however, to make a detailed study of the mystic side of Islam ; for this has been done with the greatest care by Professor R. A. Nicholson and others. An attempt will therefore be made to show the place that Şūfism and the religious orders hold in relation to Islam in India, and the influence they have had on its development and spread.

That men imbued with Şūfī doctrines early came to India there cannot be the slightest doubt ; but who these earliest comers were, or when they arrived, cannot be definitely ascertained. Sind, the first province of India to be invaded by Muslim armies, was also the first to be occupied by Muslim mystics, so that to-day it rightly claims the distinction of being the home of Indian Şūfism. Nevertheless, no matter where one goes in India or Pakistan one finds Şūfī influences powerful and active, fostered, no doubt, by the similar pantheistic doctrines that abound in Indian religious thought, which provide a very congenial atmosphere for their growth. In fact, because of the very widespread dissemination and influence of Şūfī doctrines, attempts have been made by some Muslim theologians to find a way of reconciling them to orthodox Islam. An example of such an effort is that of Muḥammad bin Faḍl Allāh, of Burhānpūr (d. A.D. 1620), who prepared a commentary on at-Tuḥfat-ul-Mursalāh ilā an-Nabī, seeking to show that the doctrines of Muslim mystics were, after all, in harmony with the teachings of the Qur'ān and the Sunnah.¹

Largely by means of poetry, Şūfī ideas have been spread throughout India. One only needs to inquire for such productions at any Muslim bookshop to see how commonly these are read. Or if one is fortunate enough to attend a mushā'arah, or assemblage of Urdū poets, he will hear the erotic notions of the Ṣūfī repeated without limit, as each poet seeks to emulate the mystic gift of expression employed by Jalālud-Dīn Rūmī and 'Umar Khayyām.

¹ E.I., II, 489, art. 'India'. Luzac.

THE RELIGIOUS ORDERS

Though Ṣūfism is found so extensively, it is not the religion of a sect. It is rather a natural revolt of the human heart against the cold formalism of a ritualistic religion. It is an attitude of mind and heart toward God and the problems of life which is as different from strictly orthodox Islam as the Quakers are from the Roman Catholics. But while Ṣūfis have never been regarded as a separate sect of Muslims, they have nevertheless tended to gather themselves around men of piety and spiritual gifts, and form themselves into religious orders. These have taken on special forms of organization, so that to-day there are a great number of such orders, which, curiously enough, belong only to the Sunnis. New orders may arise at any time, and old orders may be divided and subdivided again and again, as new saints with some special gifts of spiritual power arise. As Abū'l-Faḍl puts it,

Any chosen soul who, in the mortification of the deceitful spirit, and in the worship of God, introduced some new motive of conduct, and whose spiritual sons in succession continued to keep alight the lamp of doctrine, was acknowledged as the founder of a new line.¹

Of the many religious orders that have arisen in the world of Sunnī Islam, India early became the hospitable home for a large number. Abū'l-Faḍl mentions fourteen orders or 'families' (khāndān), which he says were common in his time, and gives their names as follows :

- | | |
|---------------|-----------------------------|
| 1. Habībīyah | 8. Firdawsīyah |
| 2. Ṭayfūrīyah | 9. Suhrawardīyah |
| 3. Karkhīyah | 10. Zaydīyah |
| 4. Saqāṭīyah | 11. 'Iyādīyah |
| 5. Junaydīyah | 12. Adhamīyah |
| 6. Kazrūnīyah | 13. Hubayrīyah |
| 7. Ṭūsīyah | 14. Chishtīyah ² |

¹ A'in-i-Akbari, tr. H. S. Jarrett, III, 357.

² Ibid., III, 354.

Few of these are among the names commonly employed to-day, though to practically all of them reference will be found in the Urdū and Persian books dealing with the religious orders. Those which are most frequently spoken of at the present, and which enjoy popular favour and influence, are the Chishtī, the Suhrawardī, the Quādirī, the Shaṭṭārī, and the Naqshbandī orders. But before we give an account of their introduction into India, and the extent of their work, the nature and form of their organization will be briefly explained, since in general all the orders are much the same.

The differences consist chiefly in a sense of personal loyalty to the founders of the orders and the peculiar practices which they enjoined on their followers. However, membership is not necessarily limited to one order, and, as often happens, a Muslim may adopt the teachings and practices of several darwīsh orders without in any way affecting his original religious and social standing in his community. Nevertheless, since celibacy is not strictly observed even by the pīrs themselves (though it is a state which is said to be preferred), as a result there is a strong tendency to form tribal groups. These groups arise because of the close spiritual affiliation among the members of the various orders, and also because of the long lines of natural and spiritual descendants of the pīrs.¹ It is from this circumstance, no doubt, that the term khāndān (family) is employed for the darwīsh fraternity.

BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

As has already been indicated, the underlying philosophy and theology of the religious orders is Ṣūfism; however, it does not follow that all Ṣūfis are necessarily members of a religious order, nor is it proper to assume that all initiates of a darwīsh order are Ṣūfis. Nevertheless, there is a close and fundamental connexion between the views of Ṣūfis and the religious orders, so much so that the latter could not have come into being without the former. Ṣūfism, with its warm, mystical yearning after union and fellowship with God, nowhere found a more suitable soil in which to thrive than India, where the very atmosphere was charged with a deep religious longing to find God, with the result that to-day it is estimated that fully two-thirds of the Muslim population are under the influence of some one or other of the darwish orders. The effort to effect union of man's soul with God, which is deemed the highest bliss, is the chief function of the religious orders. Thus Sūfism has provided the objective or philosophy of life, while it remains for the darwish orders to apply the philosophy to the everyday needs of the man in the street.

¹ H. A. Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 528.

In doing this the religious orders have performed a great service to the natural mystical instincts of the masses. Their message is something like this. God has endowed all His servants with the capacity for union with Him. They have this capacity hidden in their hearts. But it cannot be developed without guidance. Therefore it is necessary that every person should voluntarily seek to attach himself to some illumined soul, who has become qualified to lead men to God. To perform the function of spiritual leadership there have arisen pious souls, who, because of their peculiar spiritual gifts and diligence in seeking God, have been divinely blessed with the gift of miraculous powers (karāmāt). These men, out of their practical experience in the way (ṭariquah) of coming into union (waṣl) with God, have defined the stages (maquāmāt) of progress and laid down rules for the guidance of all men who desire to live on terms of the closest possible intimacy with God and His saints (walīs).

The spiritual guide is known as the murshid, pīr, or shaykh, and his disciple is called a murīd. The practice of spiritual preceptorship, therefore, is known as pīrī-murīdī, which has its counterpart in the gurū-chelā relationship among Hindus, and is very common throughout Pakistan and India. It is for the pīr to win the favour of men through his holy living, or manifestation of the favour of God upon him, through some well attested karāmāt such as miraculous healing or the revelation of hidden mysteries or secrets. Having won his reputation for piety, he begins to make disciples of men who voluntarily come to him. He then proceeds to initiate them into the religious fraternity by some simple ceremony, which includes the joining of hands and the pledging of devotion on the part of the murīd to the pīr.

The murīd is now designated a traveller (sālik) on the way (ṭariquah), and he must carefully observe the rules of the order and the ritualistic practice of dhikr if he is to make progress on the way to union (waṣl) with Allāh. Having become a traveller on the way, his aim now is to be guided by the pīr until he has advanced through the various stages (maqamāt) of divine illumination (khaṭrāt). Consequently, the problem becomes one of endeavouring to regulate the illumination or the divine ideas that are ready at all times to descend into the heart of man. Various orders of Ṣūfīs have arisen, differing from one another in respect of the rules for meditation (fikr) and ritualistic observance (dhikr), which are prescribed for the regulation of the divine illumination khaṭrāt.

The stages through which the murīd is to pass are variously described by the different orders in India, but in the main they are as described by Hughes. The first stage is that of our common humanity (Nāsūt), for which one has the law (Sharī'at) of Islam; perfection in this leads on to the stage of Malakūt, where one has the nature of angels, and must walk in the pathway of purity. The third stage is called ʿġabarūt (possession of power), for which there is Ma'rifah (knowledge). The fourth is Lāhūt (absorption in divinity), where one has Haqīquah (absolute truth).¹

The religious practices by which the sālik proceeds along the way are of vital importance. Those which are known as dhikr (remembering) have for their object the production of spiritual ecstasy (wajd), in which state (ḥāl) the one who is engaged in the dhikr may shut out all other thoughts than that of Allāh himself. The term dhikr, which is so commonly used among Muslims, means remembrance, hence it is the practice of remembering, or bringing Allāh to mind. The methods are various, some of which I have observed myself. There is the dhikr jalī (perceptible dhikr) when the exercises are performed aloud, when the voice may be raised very high, in order deliberately to shut out any other thoughts. There is the opposite of this, the dhikr khafī (imperceptible dhikr), where the person practises his repetitions quietly. Finally there is a still further advanced khafī form, in which the sālik shuts his eyes, closes his lips, and fixes his attention on his inhalations and exhalations, and 'when the breath goes out he thinks he says ' Lā ilāhah ' (There is no God)

¹ T. P. Hughes, A Dictionary of Islam, 609.

... he annihilates all external objects ; and when it comes in, he thinks he says ' illā Allāh ' (except Allāh).¹ According to a darwīsh friend of mine, there is still another and more advanced form of the dhikr khafī. His fanciful view is as follows : Every person in his breathing consciously or unconsciously utters the name Allāh, the syllable ' Al ' being the natural sound produced by the incoming breath, and ' lāh ' being the natural sound of the outgoing breath.

The loud and vociferous form of dhikr one not infrequently meets in India. The most prominent example that has come to my notice was at a railway station in northern India. A man was sitting by himself, and finally began to shout his dhikr formula aloud. It was the usual ' Lā ilāhah illā Allāh ', throwing his head downward toward his right side as he shouted ' Lā ilāhah ', and then bringing it back and throwing it downward toward the left side as he shouted ' illā Allāh '. As he proceeded his shouts grew louder, and his actions became more violent, until finally, in utter exhaustion, he sank back in a stupor, which he possibly would describe as a state of ecstasy (wajd), apparently having accomplished what he sought for on that particular occasion. To observe people engaging in silent exercise (dhikr khafī) is not uncommon, such having frequently come to my notice while travelling on the train. For this purpose the rosary (tasbīh) is often employed, to enable one to keep account of the number of times one repeats the formula.

In addition to the dhikrs that may be classed according to the voice used, we may also consider them from another standpoint. As will have been noted, the dhikr may be practised alone, or it may be performed by a congregation or group. The first kind has just been described, and may be performed at any time and any place, as we have seen. For the group, it is necessary to appoint a time and place. Such meetings are held usually on Thursday evenings ; but there seems to be no such attempt to make public displays of them as is the case in Egypt even at the present time, and as used to be the case in Turkey. As women belong to darwīsh fraternities as well as men, it is necessary for them to arrange their meetings for dhikr at such times and places as will be convenient for the women who are to gather. One such meeting was reported by my wife, who observed it in a private zanānah, in the Bijnor district, some years ago.

¹ Khāja Khān, Studies in Tasawwuf, 110.

METHOD OF ORGANIZATION

The government of the order or fraternity centres in the pīr. He is either an appointed or hereditary successor to the position of authority, and is variously called khalīfah or sajjādah nishīn. On him devolves the duty of regulating the functions of the members, of passing on the divine knowledge of the order, maintaining its practices, and of initiating new murīds as they seek admission to the fraternity. The pīr takes up his residence at the headquarters of the fraternity, which usually goes by the name of khānaquāh (monastery). The khānaquāh is an ancient institution of the darwish fraternities. Sometimes it is endowed, but sometimes not. It is often built around or over the tomb of the pīr who founded it, which forms the inner sanctuary of the building. One which I visited in 1923, at Aishmaquām, near Islamabad, in Kashmir, was an ancient structure, built above the village on the side of the mountain. I was admitted without difficulty, and in due course was escorted through labyrinthine tunnels in the rock to a cave, which formed the sepulchre of the holy man who had been the founder of the khānaquāh. On inquiry concerning the rules of the institution and the religious order, it appeared that membership was of two kinds. The lower order consisted of the laity in the villages and towns round about, who carried on their regular occupations of butcher, baker, water-carrier, tailor, mason, schoolmaster, lawyer, practically all classes being represented. The other class was connected with the monastery itself, and this in turn was divided into two classes or parties: the travellers and the dwellers. The travellers were those to whom was assigned the task of going out into the surrounding country and collecting gifts from the lay members of the order. The countryside was divided into circles (halquahs), and each of the travellers was assigned his particular circle for visitation and collection. In due course he must return to the khānaquāh with the results of his labours, which income was disposed of according to the rules of the institution. The dwellers, or those who constantly stay in the khānaquāh, were divided into three classes : the ahl-i-khidmat (servants), the ahl-i-suḥbat (associates), and the ahl-i-khilwat (recluses). The first named, according to Rose, who describes them with precision,¹ are novices who do service in order to become acceptable to the men 'of deeds and stages', those who are engaged in practices and have advanced some stages on the path or way. By service they acquire fitness for 'kinship', admission to the next degree in the order, and thus become a 'slipper out of the garment of alienation and farness', or 'put off the garment of separation from the Divine'.

The khānaquāh exercises extensive influence in the religious life of the Muslims who have elected to follow a spiritual guide, for the various darwīsh fraternities touch all classes, excepting those who have been influenced by modern education or extreme Wahhābī teachings.

INTRODUCTION OF THE REGULAR RELIGIOUS ORDERS INTO INDIA.²

The religious orders, through which Ṣūfī doctrines and practices were brought into India, have a long history. Out of the country from beyond the north-west frontier, and from Iraq, came the missionaries of these orders, the first one arriving toward the close of the twelfth century. They brought with them the fervour, devotion, and piety begotten of long contact and discipleship with spiritual leaders in those lands, and the best that they had learned from a long experience in journeyings, fastings, and pilgrimages to shrines of the saints and to holy Mecca. They easily won the favour of the multitudes, while numbers of their spiritual successors became influential guides of sovereigns, not only in spiritual but in political affairs as well. During life they enjoyed popular and royal favour; and after death their tombs became places of pilgrimage for multitudes of devout Muslims of all classes, and have continued to draw enormous crowds of devotees all through succeeding centuries. An attempt will now be made to give a brief account of each of the various orders found in India and Pakistan, attention being given to the historical order in which they were introduced.

¹ G.T.C.P., I, 518 ff.

² John A. Subhan, Ṣūfism—Its Saints and Shrines, Methodist Publishing House, Lucknow.

(I) THE CHISHTĪ ORDER

The oldest of the darwish fraternities in India and Pakistan is the Chishtī order, which traces its origin to Khwājah Abū Abdāl Chishtī, who died A.D. 966. It was introduced into India by Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī, of Sīstān, a southern district of Afghanistan, where he was born A.D. 1142. He later removed with his parents to the region of Khurāsān, and thence to the neighbourhood of Nīshāpūr, near Meshed, where he became the disciple of Khwājah 'Uthmān Chishtī Hārūnī. After more than twenty years' discipleship, he went on a pilgrimage to Mecca and Medina. Then he made a journey through Iraq and Persia, during which he made the acquaintance of many noted Sūfīs, such as 'Abd-ul-Quādir Jīlānī and Khwājah Quṭb-ud-Dīn Bakhtyār Kākī, who became one of his disciples. Finally, his travels brought him back to Herat, Balkh and Ghaznī, from whence he came in A.D. 1192 with the army of Shihāb-ud-Dīn Ghūrī to Delhi, where he stayed for a time. At the age of fifty-two, in the year A.D. 1195, he went to Ajmīr, which henceforth became his permanent residence, until his death in A.D. 1236.¹

His tomb, in the famous dargāh of the Khwājah Šāhib, at Ajmīr, is the centre of attraction for tens of thousands of Muslims, and even Hindus, who annually visit the city on the occasion of the 'urs, or festival, which celebrates the anniversary of the death of the saint. On this occasion two enormous kettles are filled with rice, at the expense of wealthy Muslims who thereby seek to win merit. The cooked contents are then distributed in portions to any of the people present who may desire some. In connexion with the dargāh mosque, which was built by Akbar, there is a flourishing madrāsah, which is largely supported by grants from H.E.H. the Nizām of Hyderabad. The Emperor Akbar was greatly devoted to the Khwājah Šāhib's tomb, and during a part of his reign made annual pilgrimages to it in performance of a vow.

¹ Ā'in-i-Akbarī, Blochmann, II, 214.

Akbar's connexion with the Chishtī tomb of Ajmīr forms a very important chapter in the history of the life of the Emperor as well as that of the tomb. In fact, it was because of the many pilgrimages he made to the shrine of Khwājah Ṣāhib that he found it necessary to build a palace there. His tomb-worship seems to have begun as the result of a vow he once made in connexion with his campaign against Chitor. He vowed that, if he took the fort of Chitor, he would walk on foot from Agra to the tomb of the holy man in Ajmīr. The fort was taken in A.D. 1568, and the vow was paid to the letter. He had made a similar vow before the birth of Jahāngīr, in A.D. 1567, and for ten successive years he made an annual pilgrimage to it. His last pilgrimage to Ajmīr seems to have been in A.D. 1579.¹

The spiritual descendants of Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī have been among the most famous saints of India, and, in order that the reader may have a clearer view of the line of successors of this important order, a list of some of their names in order is given herewith, and special mention will be made of some of them. Attention should be paid to the tendency of the order to subdivide, a characteristic that is not uncommon in the history of religious orders.

The most noted of the above list of Chishtī saints would include Khwājah Quṭb-ud-Dīn Bakhtyār Kākī, of Ush, near Baghdad, who is buried near the Quṭb Minar, at Delhi, for whom, it is said, this great column was named. He was a disciple and intimate friend of Mu'in-ud-Dīn, and died in the same year as his master.

Shaykh Farīd-ud-Dīn Shakarganj, better known as Bābā Farīd, who died in A.D. 1265, and whose tomb is at Pāk Pattan, in the Punjab, is known throughout India and Pakistan. The crowd that each year attends his 'urs, on the fifth of the month of Muḥarram, is enormous, and includes Hindus as well as Muslims. He was succeeded by two famous disciples, Ḥaḍrat Niẓām-ud-Dīn Awliyā, of Delhi, and Ḥaḍrat Makhḍum 'Alā-ud-Dīn 'Alī Aḥmad Ṣābir.

Niẓām-ud-Dīn Awliyā, whose real name was Muḥammad bin Aḥmad bin Dāniyāl al-Bukhāri, was a native of Budaun, U.P., where he was born in A.D. 1238. He soon became a ¹ Douglas, Bombay and Western India, I, 289.

THE CHISHTĪ FAMILY TREE¹

Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Din Chishtī, the saint of Ajmir

Khwājah Quṭb-ud-Din, of Delhi, the Quṭb Ṣāhib

Shaykh Farīd-ud-Din, Shakarganj, the famous Bābā Farīd, of Pāk Pattan

Ḥaḍrat Nizām-ud-Din Awliyā, of Delhi, whose spiritual descendants are called NIZĀMĪS²

Ḥaḍrat Maḥdūm 'Alā-ud-Din 'Alī Aḥmad Sabir, of Pīrān Kalīr (near Rurkī), His spiritual descendants are called ṢĀBIRĪS

Sh. Shams-ud-Din Turk, of Pānīpat

Shāhi-i-Walāyat Sh. Jalāl-ud-Din, of Pānīpat

Sh. 'Abd-ul-Ḥaqq, of Radauli (U.P.)

Sh. 'Ārif Ṣāhib

Sh. Muḥammad Ṣāhib

Sh. 'Abd-ul-Qudūs Ṣāhib, Quṭb of Gangoh (U.P.)

Sh. Jalāl-ud-Din, of Thanesar

Sh. Nizām-ud-Din, of Balkh, Afghanistan

Sh. Abū Sa'id, of Gangoh

Sh. Muḥammad Ṣādiq, of Gangoh

Sh. Dā'ūd Ṣāhib, of Gangoh

Shāh 'Abd-ul-Maiāli

Ḥaḍrat Mirān Sayyid Shāh Bhik, the famous Mirān Ṣāhib, whose tomb is at Ghuram, in Patiāla State ; and so on and so on

¹ Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 527.

² Urs of Nizam-ud-Din : At New Delhi on Jan. 16th, 1952 more than 20,000 people including a large number of Hindus and Sikhs, attended the celebration of the 646th urs of Ḥaḍrat Nizamuddin Awliā, a Muslim saint who died in Delhi during the reign of Muḥammad Tughlaq. A batch of 92 Pakistani Muslims were also present along with diplomatic representatives from Egypt, Persia, Pakistan, and Afghanistan. All addressed the congregation.—Notes on Islam, Calcutta, Feb., 1952.

favourite with his master, and was nominated by Bābā Farīd to be his khalīfah (successor) when he was only twenty years of age, seven years before the death of Farīd-ud-Dīn. During his life he enjoyed the society of many eminent contemporaries, some of whom became his disciples. The most noted of these were the poets Amīr Khusrū and Amīr Ḥasan Dihlawī, and the historian Diyā-ud-Dīn Baranī. He died in the year A.D. 1325 and his tomb in the suburbs of Delhi, surrounded by the graves of many of his followers, is still visited by devout pilgrims from near and far.

Ḥaḍrat Makhdūm 'Alā-ud-Dīn 'Alī Aḥmad Ṣābir, the second disciple of Farīd-ud-Dīn to become his successor, likewise acquired a great reputation for piety before his death in A.D. 1291. His tomb is just north of Rurkī, at a spot called Pīrān Kalīr, where there is a large gathering every year on the occasion of the saint's 'urs. His followers are called Ṣābirīs.

Nizām-ud-Dīn Awliyā left as his khalīfah Naṣīr-ud-Dīn Muḥammad, the Lamp of Delhi (Chirāgh-i-Dihlī), who died in A.D. 1356. There followed a long line of saints in this order, who became so well known that the Chishtī fraternity spread far and wide. One of the most important of these later saints was Shaykh Salīm Chishtī. He exerted a potent influence in the lives of the Mughul emperors and the royal families of his time. The Emperor Jehāngīr was born in his house, and the saint himself lies buried in a beautiful tomb at Fathpūr Sikrī. The followers of the saint, Nizām-ud-Dīn Awliyā, and his successors are called Nizāmīs.

During the two centuries following the death of Shaykh Salīm Chishtī in A.D. 1572, the Chishtī movement experienced a period of decay, which became very marked by the middle of the eighteenth century. Toward the close of that century a revival of the order throughout the Punjab and Sindh was led by Khwājah Nūr Muḥammad Quiblah-i-'Ālam, who was by ancestry a Rajput, and not of Sayyid origin, as had been the case of the former great leaders of the fraternity. Therefore, as Rose points out, 'it would seem that in a sense the modern rise of the Chishtī sect marks an indigenous revival of Islam, under religious leaders of local tribes, instead of the older Sayyid families'.¹

¹ G.T.C.P., II, 173.

The names or titles given to the holy men of the religious orders, such as Šābir and Shakarganj and so on, are very interesting in the matter of their origin. One cannot go into the account of them all, and the explanation commonly given by the followers of Šābir Sāhib must suffice as an illustration. It will be noted that the name usually reveals some special spiritual characteristic, or some special ability. The title given to 'Alā-ud-Dīn 'Alī Aḥmad is thus explained in the Gular Šābirī: 'One day Bābā Farīd, 'Alī Aḥmad's spiritual director and maternal uncle, bade him give food and alms on his behalf to the poor. This he did, and, though stationed at the kitchen (langar khānah) night and day, he did not quit it to take his food at his own house. As he got weaker day by day, his mother asked him the reason, and he replied that he had taken no food for several days as his leader's orders bade him to distribute it to others, but did not authorize him to take any himself. Also as he was required to be present at the kitchen, he could not leave it. For this he received the name Šābir (the patient one).'¹

(2) THE SUHRAWARDĪ ORDER

Following the appearance of the Chishtī order in India, the next darwīsh fraternity to be introduced was the Suhrawardī order, which was sponsored by Bahā'-ud-Dīn Zakarīya, a native of Multan. He went to Baghdād and attached himself to Shihāb-ud-Dīn Suhrawardī, the founder of the order, who was himself a contemporary of 'Abd-ul-Quādir Jilānī, founder of the Quādirī order. In A.D. 1266 he died at Multan, where his tomb is greatly revered.

His work was carried on by one of his disciples, Sayyid Jalāl-ud-Dīn Surkh-posh (A.D. 1199-1291), who was born in Bukhārā, and settled in Uch, Sind. That the order has had an extensive influence, particularly in Sind and Gujarāt, can be gathered from the following account given by Arnold. Sayyid Jalāl-ud-Dīn ' is the ancestor of generations of saints, some of whom were active and successful propagandists of Islam. His khalīfah was his grandson, Jalāl bin Aḥmad Kabīr, commonly known as Makhdūm-i-Jahāniyān (d. A.D. 1384), who is said to have made the pilgrimage to Mecca thirty-six times and to have performed innumerable miracles. One of Makhdūm-i-Jahāniyān's grandsons, Abū Muḥammad 'Abd Allāh, known as Burhān-ud-Dīn Quṭb-i-'Ālam (d. A.D. 1453), went to Gujarāt, where his tomb is still a place of pilgrimage at Batuwa. His son, Sayyid Muḥammad Shāh 'Ālam (d. A.D. 1475), became still more famous and played an important part in the political and religious life of his time ; his tomb is at Rasūlābād, near Aḥmadābād.¹

¹ G.T.C.P., I, 530; Muḥammad Yāsīn, Ḥālāt-i-Šābir.

(3) THE SHAṬṬĀRĪ ORDER

The third of the major orders in India is the Shaṭṭārī. The Emperor Humāyūn received his spiritual instruction from one of the leaders of this order, Muḥammad Ghawth, who was buried in the year A.D. 1562 at Gwalior, where Akbar raised a magnificent tomb in his honour.² One of his leading disciples, Wajīh-ud-Dīn Gujarātī (d. 1589), is buried at Aḥmadābād.³ At Meerut we find a tomb built by the Empress Nūr Jahān to the memory of Shāh Pīr, who died in A.D. 1632. This order was introduced into India from Persia by 'Abd Allāh Shaṭṭārī, who passed away in Mālwa in A.D. 1406.⁴

(4) THE QUĀDIRĪ ORDER

The fourth religious order to find entrance into the religious life of Indian Islam was the well-known Quādirī order, so named from its founder, 'Abd-ul-Quādir al-Jīlī or Jīlānī, whose tomb is at Baghdad. This famous saint is highly regarded throughout India, and frequently goes by the titles, Pīr Dastgīr, or Pīr-i-Pīrān, as well as other honorific names. Shrines are erected to secure his beneficent assistance. His festival, or 'urs, is widely celebrated on the eleventh of the month, Rabī al-ḥ-Thānī. Though the founder died in A.D. 1166, the order was not introduced into India until more than three hundred years later. In A.D. 1482 Sayyid Bandagī Muḥammad Ghawth, one of his descendants, took up his residence in Sīnd, at Uch, already made famous in the annals of Muslim saints by the Suhrawardī order. Muḥammad

¹ E.I., II, 488. ² Budāyūnī, Muntakhab-ut-Tawārikh, III, 4-6.

³ Ibid., III, 43, 44.

⁴ E.I., art. 'Shaṭṭārīya' ; Herklots, Islam in India, 289.

Ghawth died in Uch in A.D. 1517, but his sanctity has been handed down through a long line of descendants, some of whom were saints and miracle workers, and to this day representatives of the family can be found there.¹ There are numerous tombs of the saints of this order all over northern India, and the Punjab in particular. One of the most important of those was Shaykh Mir Muḥammad, or Miyān Mīr, especially distinguished because of the fact that he was the religious teacher of Prince Dārā Shikūh, son of Shāh Jahān. The biography of this saint, under the title, Sakīnat-ul-Awliyā', was written by his royal disciple. Miyān Mīr passed away in Lahore in the year A.D. 1635, where his tomb is still a well preserved object of veneration.

Some of the descendants of Pīr Dastgīr, through their ancestor, Muḥammad Ghawth, have been canonized as patron saints of certain industrial castes or guilds in the Punjab and Kashmir, to which we shall refer later on. This point is emphasized here to indicate the direct relationship that Indian Islam holds to some of the ancient founders of these orders that are spread so widely throughout the Muslim world.

(5) THE NAQSHBANDĪ ORDER

The fifth, and last, of the great religious orders to be introduced into India is known as the Naqshbandiyah, which was founded by Khwājah Bahā'ud-Dīn Naqshband of Turkestan, who died in A.D. 1389, and was buried near Bukhārā. According to Rose,² this order was introduced into India by Khwājah Muḥammad Bāquī Bi'llāh Berang, who died in A.D. 1603, and whose tomb is at Delhi. But according to Arnold,³ who refers to his letters,⁴ it was introduced by Shaykh Aḥmad al-Farūquī as-Sirhindī, who died in A.D. 1625. In the list of Naqshbandī pīrs given by Rose, Shaykh Aḥmad is mentioned as the khalīfah of Muḥammad Bāquī; but he is apparently regarded as something more than an ordinary pīr, for his full title is given as 'Imām Rabbānī Mujaddid Alif ath-thānī Shaykh Aḥmad Farūquī Sirhindī', which indicates that he was considered to be the reformer at the beginning of the second thousand years after the Prophet. His tomb is at Sirhind, in Patiāla.

¹ E.I., II, 489. ² G.T.C.P., I, 548. ³ E.I., II, 489.

⁴ Ethe, Cat. Pers. MSS, India Office, No. 1891.

This order does not seem to have been as much favoured with success as the earlier orders. Perhaps this is due to the fact of its late entry on the scene, as it came to India about four centuries after Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī made his appearance with his order, which has the largest following of all the fraternities. However, in recent times there has been a Naqshbandī revival in the Punjab and Kashmir. It is specially favoured by the educated.

(6) THE IRREGULAR OR BE-SHAR' ORDERS

The religious orders that have just been discussed are known as ba-shar' (with the law) orders, because of the fact that their followers observe the customary Islamic practices of fasting, prayer, and the like, and consequently are in better standing with the world of Islam than are the be-shar' (without the law) orders, whose followers in many cases are but Muslims in name. Nevertheless, this second group, which is without the law, influences a very large multitude. It is because of the fact that representatives of these free (āzād) orders are so widely found throughout the country that attention must be paid to them, though, as far as real Islam is concerned, they are deserving of but scant respect and consideration.

In reality, these groups cannot be styled religious orders in the same sense as those of the ba-shar' type, even though some of them appear to be offshoots of the original respectable orders. First of all, there is not the same attention given to the organization and control of the order as we find among the Ṣābirīs, for example. There is not the same regard for learning, and so the pīrs of these groups are not among the society of the learned and the great, as we found to be the case with Shaykh Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī, and men of his type. The pīrs of these orders are as often as not ignorant and even scoundrels; and since it is a case of 'like priest like people', those who associate themselves with these orders are apt to be of a similar nature.

The ordinary Muslim faqīrs of the bazaar or village belong to this sort of mendicant order. As they go about begging, singing, giving demonstrations of their ability in magic and sleight of hand, telling fortunes, writing amulets, and making charms, the uninitiated observer is likely to assume that all darwīshes are like these charlatans. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Between the *Qualandar*¹ and the devout follower of one of the regular orders is a vast difference. I think of one faqīr, especially, who was a frequent visitor at our home. He happened to be a member of the Quādiri order, and often went about in a patchwork robe of many colours. By occupation he was a tobacco merchant, and very well-to-do. Nevertheless, he spent much time reading Sūfī literature, and engaging in devotions that would lead to religious ecstasy. He was a plain, unobtrusive citizen of the business world, but his sincerity showed that he was a man who had really achieved a measure of the religious experience which he sought.

It is exceedingly difficult to give any sort of classification to the be-shar' orders which may be made in such a way as to relate them either historically to the orders from which they sprang, or to the peculiar circumstances out of which they may have arisen. Our knowledge has not gone sufficiently far to enable us to do that completely. Furthermore, it is in this field of investigation that it is most difficult to penetrate secrets of this sort, because the members of the orders are very reticent about giving information; and, since the organizations are of a more or less secret nature, the histories and the rituals have not been fully brought to light. Much of the history and ritual of these orders is handed down orally, and there are practically no publications to be found that make reference to them.

There are several of the be-shar' orders that seem to be degenerate off-shoots of regular ba-shar' fraternities; indeed, possibly all of them might be found to have some such connexion, if we could unravel all the mystery surrounding their origin. Secondly, there is another group that appear to be connected with some historical founder; for the possibility of founding new orders is not limited, as Abū'l-Faḍl reminds us.² Thirdly, we find a group whose origin it is very difficult to determine. They certainly have no conscious philosophical basis, such as is found for the regular orders; nor do they seem to have founders whose historicity can be guaranteed. Their principle of cohesion appears to consist of a common desire on the part of the members to secure a living, coupled with a common religious instinct to seek the favour of God through mediation.

¹ See p. 135.

² Ā'in-i-Akbarī, tr. Jarrett, III, 357.

(7) OFFSHOOTS OF THE REGULAR ORDERS

Of the first class, which are mendicant subdivisions or degenerate offshoots from the regular orders, the following which will be described are the more important:

From the Quādirī order has arisen the Benawā order, founded by Ghulām 'Alī Shāh, of Delhi.¹ There are also the Qūayṣar Shāhī and Naushāhī sub-orders. According to Rose, the founder of the Naushāhī order was Ḥājī Pīr Muḥammad Sachiār, whose tomb is at Naushahra, on the banks of the Chenāb, in the Punjab. He was called Naushāh, or bridegroom, because he became a faqīr while still a bridegroom. This author goes on further to describe them as follows:

Another story has it that Ḥājī Muḥammad Naushāhī Ganjbaksh, who was a year old when his father, 'Alā-ud-Dīn, a cattle dealer, died, was brought up in a family of potters and followed Sakhī Sarwār; he left four disciples, namely (1) Shāh Rāhmān Pīr, who is buried in Gujranwala, (2) Pīr Muḥammad Sachiār, (3) Khwājah Khujayl, who is buried at Kabul, and (4) Shāh Fath, who is buried in the Ganjī Bār. However this may be, the followers of this sect differ from the Quādirīs, both in allowing the use of instrumental music at divine service and in the extreme religious excitement permitted on such occasions, during which they shake their heads to and fro (ḥāl khēlnā) in a most alarming manner, and are even said to be held up by the back. Their principal shrine in Sialkot is that of Gulū Shāh, near the village of Korake, in the Pasrūr tahsīl, where there is a large annual fair. They have a branch called the Pākrahmānīs.²

From the Suhrawardī order has arisen the Jalālī order, founded by Sayyid Jalāl Bukhārī, of Uch, who lived from A.D. 1307 to 1374. They are also divided into sub-orders, one of which is called the Chihaltan, the 'forty bodies', since they claim origin from a woman 'who, desiring to be a mother, swallowed forty philtres instead of one, and produced forty children'.¹ The Malang faqirs are said to have some connexion with this order, but according to other authorities they are an offshoot of the Madāris, which to me seems more likely.

¹ Khāja Khān, Studies in Tasawwuf, 155.

² G.T.C.P., III, 166.

From the Naqshbandī order we have two off-shoots, called the Nūrbakhshī and Rabbānī sub-orders. They are of slight importance, however.

From the Taufuri order, though by a long line of descent, we have the Madāri faqirs. Accounts differ as to the manner in which this order was introduced into India. According to one account, the founder's name was Shah Badi-'ud-Din Quṭb-ul-Madār; it is related that he was a disciple of Muḥammad Ṭayfūr Shāmī, who is said to have been a Christian at one time; that he came to India from Syria, and during his travels in north India made many disciples and converts to Islam. This account fixes the date of his death as A.D. 1436. Another account indicates that he was a converted Jew of the eleventh century, from Aleppo. In all probability, the former date is more correct.

His reputation for miracles is great; and among other wonders he is reputed to have exorcised a Hindu demon, by the name of Makan Deo, from the spot where his own tomb is now worshipped in Makanpur, Oudh, near the city of Cawnpore. A great fair assembles here annually, so great and widespread is the devotion to Zinda Shāh Madār. His faqirs claim immunity from fire and from snake and scorpion bites.²

From the Junaydī order, one of the fourteen mentioned by Abū'l-Faḍl,³ is the Rafā'ī order. In some parts of India it is known as the Gurzmār order, because the faqirs carry a sort of mace (gurz) with which they strike their bodies, or even inflict grievous wounds on themselves with swords, which they claim to heal with saliva. This belief in the therapeutic value of saliva is based on the initiation ceremony. When the faqir is being initiated the murshid passes on the healing power of the saliva of the founder of the order, which he has himself received from his murshid, by rubbing a little of his own saliva on the tongue of the murid. At the same time he says, 'Wield the mace on yourself without fear, and if you are cut apply your own spittle to the wound, and it will quickly heal by the influence of your pīr, Aḥmad Sa'id'.¹

¹ Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 552; Herklots, op. cit., 292.

² Khāja Khān, op. cit., 155; E.I., II, 489.

³ Ā'in-i-Akbari, tr. Jarrett, III, 354.

Closely allied to the Rafā'is² are other similar orders, such as the Rāsūlshāhīs, of Gujarāt, known as Mastān, 'mad-men', and the Chhalapdārs, of Delhi. However, it is doubtful if there is any connexion other than similarity of practice. The former are the followers of one Rasūl Shāh, of the Alwār State who founded his order in the eighteenth century, after having received the power to work miracles from a saint in Egypt. Faqīrs of this order are found in the Punjab and Gujarāt. In the former province they are said to be men of respectable families, but in Gujarāt they have earned an unenviable reputation for insobriety, and for their ascetic practices, which are said to be 'for appearance' only.

(8) BE-SHAR' ORDERS OF INDEPENDENT ORIGIN

The orders which seem to have arisen independently of the regular orders, and yet have quite well defined historical beginnings, are a large group. It is impossible to describe them all, but an account will be given of the Qualandarī order. In north India the term Qualandar connotes one who leads about a bear or a monkey, from the dancing and tricks of which he earns a living; or it is associated with a poor, ragged beggar, obviously a Muslim, who goes from door to door singing and asking alms. If the person in the house responds, divine blessings are prayed for, but should there be a refusal or great delay, then the faqīr calls down a curse upon the dwelling. However, so credulous are the common folk of the villages, Hindus and Muslims and Christians alike, that few, if any, would dare risk the danger of a curse coming true, and as a rule the beggar does not have long to wait.

According to Sell³ the order was introduced into India by its founder, 'Alī A'ōū Yūsuf Qualandar, known as Bū 'Alī Qualandar, who was a native of Spain. After having been connected with the Baktāshī and Chishtī orders, he finally left them both, and organized an order of his own. In his travels he ultimately came to India, and settled down at Pānipat, near Delhi, where he died in A.D. 1323. The tomb of Bū 'Alī Qualandar is the chief shrine of the order, and is greatly venerated by his followers.

¹ Herklots, op. cit., 291.

² Ibid.

³ The Religious Orders of Islam, 51.

Scattered more or less all over India and Pakistan other similar be-shar' independent orders are found, which profit by the credulity and open-hearted generosity of the people. It is the common belief that giving to any poor beggar, who asks in the name of God or some saint, will somehow benefit the giver as well as the one who receives the gift. The following list is fairly complete, and includes the Mawlāī, the Dafalī, the Alif Shāhī, the Mūsā Sohāgī, the Habshī or Sīdī, the Shamsī, the Malang faqīrs, which may be a branch of the Madārī, and the Imām Shāhī. All these independent orders have more or less organization, with initiation ceremonies, and obedience to the head of the order, who can excommunicate a faqīr if he deserves it. They have their central headquarters, which receive a share of all that is collected by the faqīrs; and they settle their own internal disputes with order and dignity.¹

(9) THE UNORGANIZED BE-SHAR' GROUPS

In addition to these, there is a third class of be-shar' faqīrs who seem to be without any form of organization whatever. They are usually devotees of some particular saint's shrine, but their only organizing principle seems to be that they go to the keeper of the shrine, and indicate their desire to be initiated as faqīrs who shall henceforth be permitted to go about and beg in the name of the saint. After a brief form of initiation, the faqīr is permitted to go forth and demand alms wherever he may choose to wander. One particular instance of this is in connexion with the shrine of Dīn Panāh, in the Muẓaffargarh district, West Pakistan, and those who go out to beg are called 'Dīn Panāhīs'.

¹ See Herklots, op. cit., 289-99.

CHAPTER VII

SAINT-WORSHIP

THE religious life of Islam is so intimately connected with saints and their worship, and its history is so intertwined with them, that to think of the one without the other becomes an impossibility. In life they were men of piety, and usually attracted attention because of alleged miraculous powers, which were proofs of Divine favour. Men sought their company for worldly as well as spiritual profit. Their words and deeds were carefully noted, and faithful disciples wrote their biographies. The historians, too, noted the lives and deeds of these men, as did, for instance, Abū'l-Ḥaḍḍ and Budāyūnī ; while even emperors gave heed to their teachings, spent much time in their company, built elaborate tombs over their graves, and made pilgrimages to their shrines.

The belief in saints, and the worship of their shrines, and tombs by the Muslims of India and Pakistan is not, however, peculiar to this area. In fact, this all came largely ready-made to India, through those who introduced the religious orders into the country from Afghanistan, Persia, and Iraq. Further, owing to the ancient gurūchela practice existing among the Hindus, and the universal belief in the worship of local gods and goddesses, which was the heritage of the majority of the Muslims of India through their Hindu origin, it became all the more easy for saint-worship to become a fixed part of Muslim religious life. In fact, the Muslim masses of India and Pakistan seem to enter into the worship of saints with more enthusiasm than into the regular religious exercises which are obligatory. And in spite of all the influence of modern education and various reform movements, it is doubtful if there is really less saint-worship to-day than there was formerly.

To be sure there are groups, such as the Wāḥḥābī reformers, and the ultra-orthodox, and those of western education who have cast this all aside, but to the masses the belief in saints, and their ability to grant requests, fulfil desires, and perform miracles is still a real, positive, and practical belief. The devotee believes that the spirit of the saint is actually present in the tomb, that he hears the petitioner, and will intercede with God to grant requests, or that the saint may even fulfil them himself. This close, intimate, personal relationship which the individual feels with the saint, and which he somehow believes the saint holds for him, forms one of the most interesting phases in the study of Islam in India and Pakistan. It is a clear indication of the deep personal need which the individual feels for closer contact and fellowship with Allāh; and which somehow he believes he can secure through the mediation of the saint who was both a companion (walī) of God on the one hand, and a friend and companion of man on the other.

The belief in the miraculous powers of saints to help and to heal covers almost the whole category of human need. Some saints are supposed to exhibit certain virtues that others do not. At Amroha, in the Moradabad district, is the tomb of a saint who is supposed to heal scorpion stings, and it is asserted that the scorpions around his tomb will not sting. Another saint, in the same place, has the power to produce the flow of milk in cows which have gone dry prematurely, and nursing mothers, who have need, also seek help from him. The graves of saints are visited by litigants seeking victory in law cases; by the farmer who has lost a horse; by the woman who desires a child; by the father who seeks healing for his sick boy; by the merchant who desires prosperity in business; by the hunter who wants a lucky day; by the gambler, and even by the thief.

There are many instances to show the reverence and fear with which the saints were regarded even by the rulers themselves. Their anger once aroused, could, it was believed, bring the most unexpected and terrible disasters; and their favour, when procured, was productive of great blessing. For example, we are told that the sudden death of Ghiyāth-ud-Dīn Tughluq Shāh, in A.D. 1325, was due to a prophecy by Shaykh Nizām-ud-Dīn Awliyā, who felt insulted at some remarks made by that sovereign. The pious Emperor Firūz Shāh was especially careful about his treatment of these holy men. He writes, 'Wherever I heard of a faqīr I went to visit him, and ministered to his necessities, so that I might attain the blessing promised to those who befriend the poor'.¹ The same sovereign, before his expedition to Thatta, 'made pilgrimages to the saints and holy men who were buried near Delhi, . . . as the other great kings had done before him, to invoke the assistance of their prayers, . . . to cast himself on their protection, not trusting to his own power and greatness'.²

One very striking instance of the supposed effect of arousing divine displeasure by the ill-treatment of a darwish was the case of Sīdī Mawlā, in the reign of Fīrūz Shāh Khaljī, about the year A.D. 1295. The darwish was believed to have been plotting against the emperor. So he was ordered to be put to death; and Amīr Khusrū, in his Ta'rikh-i-'Alā'ī, relates that 'the divine displeasure was manifest at the killing of such a holy man. I, the author, well remember that on the day of the Sīdī's death a black storm arose which made the world dark. Troubles afterwards arose in the State. . . . In the same year there was a scarcity of rain, there was dearth in Delhi, and grain rose to a jital (about half a penny) per sīr (three-quarters of a pound, then).³ In the Siwalik also the dearth was greatly felt. The Hindus of that country came into Delhi with their families, twenty or thirty of them together, and in the extremity of their hunger drowned themselves in the Jumna.'⁴

SHRINES

The shrine where a saint is worshipped and at which his favours are sought, is not always his tomb. It may be presumed, however, that tombs receive more regard than the memorial shrines, which are not infrequently set up by the saint's devotees. On the part of those who believe in saints, it is conceived that it is possible to erect a memorial to a saint anywhere, to call it by his name, and that, by virtue of this act, prayers and offerings made at this shrine will be quite as effective as a visit to his actual resting-place. The shrine, which has been so dedicated to a saint, may be made of bricks,

¹ Futūhāt-i-Fīruz Shāhī, E.D., III, 387.

² Shams-i-Sirāj 'Afif, E.D., III, 321.

³ See S. Lane-Poole, Mediaeval India, 150.

⁴ Amīr Khusrū, E.D., III, 146.

stone, or mud. Sometimes it is made in the form of a tomb, with a head-stone, provided with niches to receive lights placed there by the worshipper. It may be of any size, and I have seen crude piles of earth doing service for shrines. Often there is a flag (jhandā) on a long pole attached to the shrine; and not infrequently the neighbouring trees and bushes are considered specially sacred to the saint, and must not be violated. Rags or thread tied on a shrine are in testimony of prayers answered.

The common name which is applied to the saint, living or dead, as well as to his tomb or shrine, is pīr. Another name which is often employed for the shrine, especially in Kashmir, is ziyārat.¹ The number of such ubiquitous pīrs is legion. They are found in every village, town, or city where Muslims live. Even in lonely lanes of the country-side, in the fields and groves, in forests, and in the mountains one may find the grave of a pīr, who, though he may have been dead hundreds of years, is still an active source of blessing to all who believe in him. Sometimes, in the course of years, a shrine of a pīr will become neglected, then forgotten, and then obliterated. The saint thus forgotten may remain disregarded for generations, and then something will occur to bring him back to active usefulness again. One of the most unusual cases of this sort that has come to my notice was in north India, in the Moradabad district, near the village of Pākbarā. In an open cultivated field near the village was a tree, under which, not long since, it was discovered there were some bricks, which appeared on close examination to form what was believed to be the tomb of a Muslim saint which had fallen into neglect. The elders from the surrounding villages were consulted, and the general conviction was forthcoming that this was indeed the grave of a saint which had been for many years sadly neglected. Additional proof as to the validity of this conviction, moreover, was found, when it was noted that the tree itself, which was adjacent to the tomb, exuded a gummy juice of a reddish colour, which was said to betoken the miracle-working power of the saint. The result was that the tomb, which had been neglected for such a long time, was restored to good and regular standing among the pīrs of the country-side. Devotees began to seek favours. Among them was one, in particular, that came to my knowledge. A man was suffering from incipient blindness, and in order to secure relief his wife took him a very long and tiresome journey in an ox-cart, to beseech this newly-found pīr for relief.

¹ Or ziyārat-gāh—‘a place to visit’ for a blessing from a Saint who is buried there.

The tombs and shrines of saints are usually under the care of guardians. If the tomb is that of a very important saint, such as that of Mu'īn-ud-Dīn Chishtī, at Ajmīr, it is well cared for. The guardians of the shrine are usually the direct lineal or spiritual descendants of the saint. In addition to the income that is derived from the collections made by the wandering members of the religious order, there is that which comes from visitors, even including tourists from foreign lands, who go only out of curiosity. Besides this, emperors used to repair certain tombs at public expense, and sometimes the tombs were endowed by them. Even to-day the Government of India is at some pains to keep the tomb of the saint, Salīm Chishtī, at Fathpūr Sikrī, in repair, because of its undoubted archaeological interest.

WORSHIP OF THE SAINTED DEAD

The shrines of the humbler saints, however, enjoy a humbler form of care, in accord with their dignity and worth. Here one finds by the roadside a tomb. Once a year or so it receives a coat of whitewash if it is built of brick, or only a coat of clay-wash if it is of raised earth. Either by inheritance, or by appointment from his brotherhood, the caretaker obtains his right to look after the tomb, keep it in repair, and receive part or all of his daily sustenance from the gifts of those who come to pay their vows. So, either daily or weekly on some fixed day, he takes up his duties as officiant of the shrine, and waits for the devotees to arrive.

The worship at the shrines is of a simple character. It consists of two separate divisions. The first is for the benefit of the saint, the second for the benefit of the worshipper. The first may consist of offerings of money or anything of value, the offering of flowers or the lighting of a lamp (chirāgh), or merely the repetition of the Fātiḥah (the first chapter of the Qur'ān) for the benefit of the saint himself. For the second part of the worship the individual stands or sits somewhere near the shrine, facing it. Here he communes in his heart with the saint, telling him his troubles, difficulties, desires, or aspirations, and vowing that, if the saint will be gracious enough to fulfil this desire, he will return and make an offering and oblation, which he there and then determines upon and promises to the saint. I happened to be present once at a shrine when the offerings were being brought in, and people were paying their vows. An inquiry elicited the following information: Nearly every one who came to pay his vows brought a chirāgh (a small cup containing oil and a wick) to be lighted. In addition, each worshipper brought some other thing which the guardian of the shrine could make use of. One brought money, a few pice; another brought a couple of yards of green cloth, which was spread over the tomb; another brought cooked rice; another some sugar; another some sweets, and so on. This was placed first of all on the shrine, and then some of it was taken off, and small portions of the sweets, sugar, or rice were distributed to those who were present. Such distributed portions are known as tabarruk, portions that have received the saint's special blessing. I have received such 'blessed portions' on several occasions. Of the persons questioned, one said that he had come to the shrine because he had vowed to the saint a week ago that if his pony, which had been lost, were found he would make such and such an offering, and he had come to keep his vow. Another said her child had been sick and was well again. Thus the story goes, and this was but one shrine out of hundreds in India and Pakistan which Muslims venerate, and to which they pay a large part of their most fervent religious devotion.

While there are usually special days each week on which the saints' tombs are regularly visited, the great day of the year for each saint is the time of the celebration of his 'urs'. This is an Arabic term which means 'wedding', and is used to refer to the saint's death, because of the Sūfī idea that at his death there occurs the union (wasl) or 'wedding' of his soul to Allāh. Sometimes the 'urs' lasts several days, but the great day of the feast is always the anniversary of the saint's death. Such an occasion is made a time of great rejoicing, meeting of friends, and feasting, as well as the observance of religious exercises in memory of the saint. Shop-keepers come and set up their rows of shops. Amusement makers are present with their merry-go-rounds and swinging chairs. Books, containing the biography of the saint, accounts of his miracles and marvellous deeds, and elegies written in his praise, are sold to the throngs that gather from a wide circuit. People go dressed in their best and gayest attire. It is a time of outing, and people of all classes will be found in such gatherings, whether they have any particular belief in saints or not. Sometimes a gathering of this sort will be made an occasion for the display of certain alleged relics of the Prophet himself. At one such 'urs, I saw an exhibition of a hair of the Prophet's beard, one of his garments, and a stone bearing an imprint of the Prophet's foot, this relic being called the noble foot-print (quadam sharīf), of which there are numerous examples in India and Pakistan.

The solemn part of the 'urs, of course, has to do with the rites in connexion with the saint's tomb. Every comer is permitted to enter the enclosure of the shrine, if there be one, after having carefully removed his shoes. *Fātiḥahs*¹ are said for the saint, offerings of money and sweets and the like are made, and the worshippers pass out. When night comes on, the readers of the Holy Qur'ān take their position near the shrine, and the most serious part of the ceremony begins. The programme calls for the reading of the whole of the Qur'ān through at one sitting, which ceremony is called a khatm. In order to do this the thirty divisions, or juz, of the Qur'ān are allotted to thirty readers. These juz are approximately of equal length, and so by this method the whole of the Qur'ān is read for the benefit of the saint's soul. The 'urs is a very important factor in the religious life of Muslims, and takes its place along with the other religious festivals. While some 'urses are of only local importance, others, such as that of Bābā Farīd-ud-Dīn, at Pāk Pattan, Mu'īn-ud-Dīn Chishtī, at Ajmīr, and Zinda Shāh Madār, at Makanpur, Oudh, have a most extended influence, and many thousands visit them annually coming from great distances.

¹ Recitations of the Fātiḥah (first chapter of the Qur'ān).

The manner in which the tomb of a saint may become the centre of the religious activity of a place is well illustrated in the case of the well-known dargāh of Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī Ṣāhib, at Ajmīr, to which reference has been made again and again. There is in connexion with this shrine a mosque built by the Emperor Akbar, in which is a mosque school, or madrasah, for the training of religious leaders, and also a takyah, or hostelry, for darwishes. In other places the shrine becomes the centre for a monastery (khānaquāh).

VARIOUS KINDS OF TOMBS : MARTYRS

The tombs and shrines of saints or pīrs may be also considered from the standpoint of their origin. Some have a historical connexion with some religious order; and these we have already considered in their relation to the religious life of Muslims. These have come into the calendar of saints in a perfectly regular manner, but there are others whose legitimacy is not so well attested, and the records of whose lives are so overlaid with legend that it is really impossible to give an accurate account of their origin. Some of these come in the class of shahīds, or martyrs, who died fighting the battles of Islam in the early days of Muslim conquest. Two of the most important of these semi-legendary characters are known as Ghāzī Miyān Sālār Mas'ūd and Sakhī Sarwār Sultān, of whom some notice will now be taken. The former was a nephew of Maḥmūd of Ghaznī. While still a youth of only nineteen, he is said to have invaded Oudh, where he met his death in a battle in the year A.D. 1033, near Bahraich. His tomb is venerated by Muslims, who regard him as a martyr (shahīd). Sakhī Sarwār Sultān belongs to the Punjab, and though little is historically certain about his origin he has many devotees. Shrines raised to his honour are found in almost every village of the central Punjab.¹ At Dhonkal, we are told, Sultān had taken up his abode, and produced a well with a marvellous stream of water, which is now regarded as sacred. There is a fair held here every year, which lasts for a month in June and July, to which come as many as two hundred thousand people, ' who drink the sacred water and take away fans and sprigs of menhdī (henna) as mementos of their visit '.¹

¹ Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 570.

HINDU-MUSLIM SAINTS

Other well-known saints, of more or less legendary character, that have a certain amount of standing with certain classes are numerous. Some of them, while having Muslim names to-day, seem to have little connexion with the Muslim community or faith. Mere mention will be made of them here, as they have more of a bearing on the influence of Islam on the indigenous faiths of the country than with Islam itself. However, they should be mentioned, as showing the manner in which saint-worship among Muslims gradually shades off until it is scarcely distinguishable from some of the animistic phases of primitive religious life. One such ' saint ' is Gūggā Pīr, or Zāhir Pīr, who is thought to have been a Hindu convert to Islam, and is said to have flourished toward the middle of the twelfth century. He is particularly associated with Rajputana; but his devotees, mainly low-caste people, are found throughout large areas of northern India and the north-west, where his shrines are built even in the houses. Lāl Beg is another such ' saint ', who is particularly patronized by the sweeper community of north India. There is also a following of a group of saints known as the Panj Pīr (five pīrs). Worshippers of this group erect shrines to all five of the saints and worship at them. The lists, however, do not agree. Lucknow, for instance, has one list, Benares another, Bihar another, the Punjab another. One list includes Ghāzī Miyān, Pīr Hathīlī sister's son of Ghāzī Miyān, Parihar, Sahjā Māi, and ' Ajab Sālār. According to Crooke, Benares has no less than five lists that are current. They, too, are worshipped by low-caste Hindus. A more respectable list is the following Bahā'-ul-Ḥaqq, of Multan; Shāh Ruq'ah-i-Ālam Ḥadrat, of Lucknow; Shāh Shams Tabrīz, of Multan; Makhdūm-i-Jahāniyān, of Uch; and Bābā Farīd-ud-Dīn, of Pāk Pattan.²

¹ Ibid.

² Crooke, P.R.F.L., I, 203.

LEGENDARY SAINTS

Attention must be paid, also, to the wholly legendary saints of Islam. One of these, Khwājah Khidr, enjoys a reputation that is as wide as the Muslim world itself, but the remainder appear to be of purely local origin. Khwājah Khidr goes by various names, such as Rājā Kidar, where Hindu influence is strong. In Bengal his name is Kāwaj, or Pīr Badr.¹ There may also be other local corruptions of the name, which one must always be prepared to meet. Khwājah Khidr is a legendary saint of Muslim lore, who is said to trace his connexion to Noah, and throughout the Muslim world he is associated with water. Thus he comes to be a saint of the sea. His special vehicle is a fish, on which he is often pictured as riding. His garments are green, whence his name Khidr is derived, and he is thought to have life-giving powers. In fact, he is considered to be alive in the world still, though unseen. So far as I am aware, shrines are not built to this saint, but he is worshipped in connexion with such ceremonies as the 'aqīquah, or shaving of the head of a child for the first time. Offerings are also made to him at wells; and persons who are travelling by sea, or who are descending into a well, will seek his favour. He is also propitiated when the water in a river is low or there is danger of a flood.² His worship naturally becomes a prominent part in the life of those who believe in him, since water is identified so closely with all that concerns the maintenance of life itself. Little wonder that he is looked upon as the giver of life and the restorer of life, when one remembers to what an extent Indians and Pakistanis depend on the rivers and the wells for irrigation, and the quenching of thirst during the long seasons of no rainfall, when all is parched and dry under a burning sun.

In addition to the occasional or special worship of Khwājah Khidr, Muslims make much of what is called his Berā. This is a festival which takes its name from the berā, or raft, on which the worshippers place burning lamps (chirāgh), bouquets of flowers, fruits, sweetmeats, and other eatables. These are then set afloat on the stream in the name of Khidr, whose blessing they seek.¹

¹ Ibid., I, 47.

² Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 564.

Another saint of the very opposite character to the beneficent Khidr is Shaykh Saddū, who has votaries throughout India and Pakistan, particularly among women. The legend goes that he was an Arabic scholar, with occult powers, who used certain verses of the Qur'ān for magical purposes, by which he is popularly supposed to have been able to bring the Jinn under his control. It is related that, at one time, he fell in love with a beautiful princess; and, finding it impossible to secure her hand in marriage, he invoked the help of his friends, the Jinn, to bring her by night to his residence. This became a regular performance, and she was always returned to the palace before dawn. All this appeared to the princess as a dream; but, being at last overcome by the performance, she reported the matter to the king, who had the Shaykh executed.¹ Another account says that he was ultimately torn to pieces at Amroha, near Moradabad, by the Jinn he was supposed to control.² In any case, many ignorant Muslims still believe that he haunts and worries their women, and he is also supposed to harm children. Women become 'possessed', as they believe, by Shaykh Saddū through the performance known as baiṭhak, where, dressed in men's clothes, they gather and sit the whole night listening to the music that is supposed to induce the possession of the Shaykh's spirit. In this state of ecstasy they are supposed to be able to reveal the Shaykh's advice as to how to attain their desires, or those of their friends.

There is another ceremony similar to the zār,³ or 'black mass', so common in Egypt, which is known as the Bakrā-i-Shaykh Saddū. This is celebrated in order to drive out his spirit, and to keep him away from women and children. This ceremony of exorcism is observed by the slaughter of kids and goats. Then there is a feast, which is sometimes accompanied with music and dancing, and by the recital of poems composed in commendation of the virtues and excel-

¹ Abū'l-Anwār, Moslem Festivals, 55 ff; Herklots, op. cit., 135, 136; E.I., art. 'Khidr'.

² Abū'l-Anwār, Moslem Festivals, 59 f.

³ Herklots, op. cit., 139.

⁴ Cf. S. M. Zwemer, Animism in Islam, 227 ff.

lences of the Shaykh. Oftentimes women 'possessed' by the Shaykh are taken to the place of the performance, which, they imagine, will instantaneously cure their sufferings.¹ At his tomb or place of worship, at Amroha, it is said that there is much noise and disturbance always going on.²

In addition to the legendary saints above mentioned, there are many others, such as Pīr Shitāb, Pīr Mīlao, Pīr Dīdār, Kath Bāwā Ṣāhib, Pīr Imām Zāmin, and the like. It is always of interest to try to ascertain the names of the saints who are being worshipped by the Muslims of a given locality, in order to discover how many of them are more or less universally venerated, and how many enjoy only a local or provincial celebrity.³

NAU-GAZĀ PĪRS

The nau-gazā pīrs form a curious class of shrines which deserve closer study than they have received. The term refers to the length of the tomb, nau-gazā meaning nine yards, and merely indicates that the saint was a personage of great stature. One such tomb is at Multan, where Shadma Shahīd is said to be buried, but as a rule nau-gazās are not connected with shahīds.⁴ For the most part they are associated with giants of former days. Possibly they are only shrines of the ancient prophets, who are thought by some to have attained enormous height. The following statement, given by Crooke, is all I have been able to find on the subject. 'There is one of these tombs at Nagaur, in Rajputana, and several others have been discovered in the course of the Archaeological Survey. Five of them at Vijhi measure respectively twenty-nine, thirty-one, thirty, and thirty-eight feet. . . . Adam himself is supposed to have been sixty yards in height, and there was a monster called 'Uj in the days of Adam, and the flood of Noah reached only to his waist. There is a tomb of Noah at Faizabad which is said to have been built by Alexander the Great, and not far off are those of Seth and Job. The latter, curiously enough, are gradually growing in size. They are now seventeen and twelve feet long respectively, but when

¹ Abū'l-Anwār, Moslem Festivals, 59.

² Herklots, op. cit., 139.

³ Ibid., 134 ff.

⁴ Crooke, Introduction to P.R.F.L., 140.

Abū'l-Fazl wrote they were only ten and a half and nine feet long.¹ I have seen one such tomb in the fields lying between Moradabad and Rampur, U.P., which was said to be a nāu-gazā pīr, and it measured between twelve and fifteen feet in length.

There are other shrines worshipped by Muslims, which seem to be of Hindu or Buddhist origin, but attention will be given to them when we come to consider the influence of Hinduism on Islam.

PATRON SAINTS

Patron saints deserve special study, because of their close relationship to certain classes of work and particular classes of individuals. First of all, the patron saint may be considered from the standpoint of the immediate vicinity or village, or quarter of a city, with which he may be connected. In Lucknow, in the quarter known as Golaganj, there is the tomb of a saint of little known reputation, who is specially worshipped by the people of the locality, over whose welfare he is supposed to preside. On one occasion, when new buildings of the Lucknow Christian College were being erected, some very heavy steel girders had to be raised, which placed many lives in jeopardy. After they had all been safely raised, the Muslim workmen proceeded to procure some sweetmeats, and forthwith went to the tomb to make the offering and express their gratitude for the protecting care of the saint who lies buried in the same compound.

As we have already seen, Khwājah Khidr is intimately connected with water, and so naturally becomes the patron saint of sailors, and also of dhobīs and bihishtīs (washermen and watercarriers). The local descendants of the famous 'Abd-ul-Quādir-i-Jilānī, known as the Pir Dastgīr, have given some patron saints to Pakistan especially associated with industrial castes or local guilds in the Punjab. At Lahore, Fīrūz Shāh Jilānī, a disciple of Shāh 'Ālam, is the saint of the dandigars or kheradīs (turners). Ḥassan Telī is the patron saint of the oilmen (telīs), while the dyers of Lahore look to Pīr 'Alī Rangrez.² Ma'lūm-i-yār is another patron saint of boatmen and sailors, while Sher Shāh, of Multan, cares for the interests of persecuted lovers. Shāh Dawlah takes care of 'microcephalic children', called Shāh Dawlah's rats !¹

¹ Crooke, P.R.F.L., I, 223 f.

² Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 543.

NEW SAINTS

As we have seen, there are all kinds of saints in India and Pakistan, who are in one way or another connected with the life history of Islam. There are good saints, whose lives were lived on a high plane; there are also some not so good. There are historical saints and legendary saints; real saints and fantastic saints; universal saints and local saints; and, lastly, old saints and new saints. Canonization still continues. Various writers have mentioned instances which are on record, such as Patūkī Sā'in, of Motihari, Bihar, whose grave is said to be visited chiefly by litigants. His death occurred as late as the decade between 1860 and 1870.

One of the newest saints to be placed in the calendar is the one commonly spoken of as the 'New Market Saint' of Calcutta. This is one of the most remarkable examples of its kind on record. For a long time there had been sitting in the public market in Calcutta a beggar, who was regarded as being above the ordinary in sanctity because he did not talk and was supposed to have taken a vow of silence. Day after day he sat in the market, and lived on the alms of passers-by. One day, while sitting in his regular place in a small alley between two rows of shops, he died. The Muslims at once claimed the body, and declared that, since he was regarded as a very holy man, his body should be buried on the spot where he died. The grave was dug, and the burial was performed. The alley, which had formerly been a regular passage for the public, was closed up, and when I saw it in the month of November, 1924, the newly canonized 'saint' was being carefully looked after by the duly appointed guardians of the tomb. They received the cash offerings, which must have been considerable, since, from the standpoint of drawing crowds, the spot was the best location for saints in all Calcutta. A saint's tomb in a public market, however, was not an unmixed blessing, and the city authorities endeavoured to have the body removed. This aroused great opposition, so finally the matter was compromised by completely enclosing the passage-way to prevent access to the tomb, which remains there to this day.

¹ E.I., II, 489.

PERSISTENCE OF THE BELIEF IN SAINT WORSHIP

Bernier relates, in his most interesting account of his travels in the Mughul Empire, the following description of a visit to a saint's tomb in Kashmir, which at once reveals the fact that the Muslim masses of India and Pakistan have changed but little through hundreds of years in respect to their credulity and reverence for the sainted dead. The author says that he was importuned by one Dānishmand Khāṇ to visit Bāramūla, where he would see a mosque containing the tomb of a celebrated pīr, who, though dead, miraculously cures sick and infirm.

'Perhaps', said Dānishmand Khāṇ, 'you may deny the reality either of the disease or of the cure but another miracle is wrought by the power of the holy man, which no person can see without acknowledging. There is a large round stone that the strongest man can scarcely raise from the ground, but which eleven men, after a prayer made to the saint, lift up with the tips of their eleven fingers with the same ease as they would move a piece of straw.'

Bernier describes his experience in his usual vivid fashion :

'I found,' he writes, 'the Mosque to be a tolerable building and the Saint's tomb is richly adorned. It was surrounded with a great number of people, engaged in acts of devotion, who said they were ill. Adjoining the Mosque is a kitchen, wherein I observed large boilers filled with meat and rice, which I conceived at once to be the magnet that draws the sick and the miracle that cures them. On the other side of the mosque are the apartments and garden of the Mullahs, who pursue the even tenor of their way under the shadow of the Pīr's miraculous sanctity. They are sufficiently zealous in celebrating his praises, but as I am always unhappy on similar occasions, he performed no miracle upon the sick while I remained there. As to the round and heavy stone that was to convert me, I noticed that eleven Mullahs formed themselves into a circle round it, but what with their long cabayes, or vests, and the studied compactness of the circle, I had great difficulty to see the mode in which they held the stone. I watched narrowly, however, the whole of this cheating process, and, although the Mullahs stoutly maintained that each person used only the tip of one finger, and that the stone felt as light as a feather, yet I could clearly discover that it was not raised from the ground without a great effort, and it seemed to me that the Mullahs made use of the thumb as well as of the forefinger. Still I mixed my voice with the cries of these impostors and bystanders, exclaiming Karamet ! Karamet ! A miracle ! a miracle ! I then presented them with a roupie, and, assuming a look of deepest devotion, entreated that I might have for once the distinguished honours of being among the eleven who lifted the stone. The Mullahs were reluctant to comply with my request, but, having presented them with a second roupie, and expressed my belief in the truth of the miracle, one of them gave up his place to me. No doubt they hoped that ten would be able, by an extraordinary effort, to lift the stone, although I contributed no other aid than the tip of my finger, and they expected to manage so adroitly that I should not discover the imposture. But they were much mortified to find that the stone, to which I persevered in applying the end of my finger only, was constantly inclining and falling towards me. I considered it prudent at last to hold it firmly with both by finger and thumb, when we succeeded, but with great difficulty, in raising it to the usual height. Observing that every person looked at me with an evil eye, not knowing what to think of me, and that I incurred the danger of being stoned, I continued to join in the cry of Karamet ! and, throwing down a third roupie, stole away from the crowd. Though I had taken no refreshment since my arrival, I did not hesitate to mount my horse directly, and to quit forever the Dervishe and his miracles.¹

There is no other phase of the life of Muslims in India and Pakistan that is so full of human interest as this which has to do with the religious orders and saints. It may not be orthodox ; it may be condemned by the maulvis, the Wahhābīs, and the modern reformers of the day, but nevertheless it does not die. It persists, lives, and functions in the lives of those who believe, because for them there is something intimately personal and satisfying in this form of worship which they do not find in the more rigid and respectable forms. They seem to long for a mediator and intercessor with God, just as they find an intercessor so valuable in dealing with the Collector, the Judge, the Governor, or any others of the great ones with whom they have to deal. The Muslim masses move on as always with the same devotion to their pīrs, living or dead ; and until the time arrives when general enlightenment shall come through widespread modern education, it is not likely that there will be much lessening of the hold that the pīrs have on the minds, hearts, and purses of the common people, whether in India or Pakistan.

¹ Bernier, op. cit., 414 ff.

CHAPTER VIII

ISLAM IN ITS HINDU ENVIRONMENT

IN order the better to understand and appreciate the effect of Indian surroundings on Islam, it will be useful to know the extent to which Indian religious thought reached Muslim countries and affected the religion of Muḥammad before the Muslim conquest of India took place. Much scholarly investigation has been done in this field, so by way of introduction, a summary of the results of this work will be presented.

The contacts of the Muslim world with India were definite and well-established even before the tenth century.¹

As we have already seen, there had been a partially successful attempt, early in the eighth century, on the part of the Umayyad caliphate to annex Sind to its rapidly expanding empire. Unfortunately, we do not know to what extent this connexion with India may have influenced later developments in religious thought ; but such contacts as this, which brought Indian thought well within the horizon of Islam, could not but help to produce an influence, as Goldziher aptly points out.²

Secondly, there was the presence of wandering Indian monks, who ' did not appear on the Moslem horizon in any theoretical way alone ', for, as early as the time of the 'Abbāsīd caliphate at Baghdad, these monks ' were a factor of practical importance to the adherents of Islam, just as in earlier times the wandering Christian monks had attracted attention in Syria. Jāḥiẓ (d. A.D. 866) pictures very graphically the wandering monks, who could have belonged neither to Christianity nor to Islam. He calls them ' Zindiq monks One of the anecdotes told of the beggar lives of these monks goes so far as to say that one of them preferred to bring suspicion of theft upon himself, and endure maltreatment, rather than betray a thieving bird, because he did not wish to be the cause of the death of a living being. If these people were not actually Indian sādhūs or Buddhist monks, they were at least men who were following the example and method of the latter.¹

¹ For Arabian connexion with India before Islam see De Lacy O'Leary's Arabia Before Muḥammad, 59-83.

² Vorlesungen über den Islam, 161, 162.

Thirdly, mention should be made of Buddhist works, which were translated in the second century of the Islamic era, largely under the 'Abbāsid Caliphs, Maṣū' (A.D. 754-775) and Hārūn (A.D. 786-809). These were rendered into Arabic partly from the Persian or Pahlavī translations, while others were translated direct from the Sanskrit.

Among these translations of Indian books that became embodied in Arabic literature 'we find an Arabic version of the Balauhar wa Būdāsāf' (Barlaam and Josaphat),³ and also a Budd-book.⁴⁻⁵

Fourthly, we may mention the direct contact of Buddhist monasteries in Eastern Persia and Transoxiana, which were in existence and flourishing in Balkh long before the eleventh century, when the extended Muslim conquest of India began.⁶

These points of contact with Indian life and thought may be traced to three lines of influence in Islam. First is the influence in secular or popular literature. 'Many a deliverance of ethical and political wisdom, in the dress of proverbs, was taken over from the fables and tales of India, such as the Tales of the Panchatantra.'⁷

Secondly, in the realm of science. Through the translations of Indian works on mathematics and astrology, 'the latter in combination with practical medicine and magic', secular wisdom in Islam was largely indebted to the East; and 'the astrology of the Siddhānta of Brāhma Gupta, which was translated from the Sanskrit under Maṣū' by Fazārī, assisted by Indian scholars, was known even before Ptolemy's

¹ Goldziher, Vorlesungen, tr. Seelye, 172, 173.

² T. J. de Boer, History of the Philosophy of Islam, 9.

³ The story of the conversion of an Indian prince, Josaphat (Buddha), by the ascetic Barlaam.

⁴ A book teaching the doctrines of Buddha.

⁵ Goldziher, op. cit., 161.

⁶ R. A. Nicholson, The Mystics of Islam, 16.

⁷ de Boer, op. cit., 9.

Almagest. A wide world and future was thereby opened up.¹

The third line of influence comes within the distinctly religious sphere. But it is not by any means the whole of Islamic thought that has been affected; and apparently it is only in the development of Islamic mysticism, or Ṣūfism, that any well-defined traces can be found, but these are all important. Here the contribution seems to be made in thought, religious imagery of expression, and pious practices, which come from both Buddhist and Vedantic sources. I shall now give the conclusions arrived at in respect of these factors.

One of the earliest evidences of the influence of contact with Indian ideals of life appears to have manifested itself in the religious view 'which arose in opposition to legal Islam, known as zuhd, or asceticism', but which in itself is not identical with Ṣūfism. Goldziher further points out how one of the advocates of the zuhd doctrine, Abū'l-'Atāhiyah (A.D. 748-825), was set up as 'an example of a highly honoured man: "the king in the garments of a beggar . . . it is he whose reverence is great among men"'. And then he goes on to suggest his own views as to whence this ideal was drawn, by asking, 'Is this not the Buddha?'²

When we come to the more advanced philosophic conceptions of Ṣūfism there is likewise general agreement in the following points. First, that, escaping beyond the logical confines and implications of the neo-Platonic theory of pantheism, which first laid its hold on Islamic thought, the idea of absorption (fanā) of the personality in God (fī Allāh) comes to hold a definite place among the Ṣūfī conceptions of the possible relations between the Soul of the Universe and the human soul. While this idea of fanā, as understood by the Ṣūfī, carries with it a concomitant theory of baquā, or continuance of the personality somehow in or with Allāh, which notion is excluded from Hindu ideas of absorption, yet Professor Nicholson states his conviction that the idea of 'passing away (fanā) into Universal Being is certainly of Indian origin'. He further goes on to say that, while its first great exponent was the Persian mystic, Bāyazīd of Bistām

¹ Ibid.

² Goldziher, op. cit., 172.

(d. A.D. 875), yet he is inclined to believe that he may have received it from his teacher, Abū 'Alī, of Sind, who may have himself become indoctrinated with Vedantic teachings.¹

The Ṣūfī doctrine of tawhīd, or the unity of God, appears to Goldziher to be dependent on Indian philosophy, and he goes on to show how the Ṣūfī idea is 'fundamentally different from the usual Muslim monotheistic conception of God'. A Ṣūfī goes so far as to say it is shirk (giving associates to God) to assert that 'I KNOW GOD': for in this sentence duality between perceiving subject and object to knowledge is involved; and this is also the current Indian view.²

The religious practices in Ṣūfī communities connected with the following of the mystic path are clearly traced in some of their aspects to Buddhism. This would include 'ethical self-culture, ascetic meditation, and intellectual abstraction', through the well-known yoga practices of Indian asceticism.³ Goldziher, likewise, on the authority of Kremer, agrees when he says that 'many of the forms of the religious practice of dhikr in the Ṣūfī communities, as well as the means for bringing about the kenosis and ecstasy, the discipline of breathing', are clearly traced to Indian origin. One of the most common of these means of devotion is the rosary, or tasbīh, 'which soon spread beyond the Ṣūfī circle, the Indian origin of which . . . is beyond question. It began in Eastern Islam, which is the hearth of Indian influence exerted on Ṣūfī society.'⁴

THE FIRST CONCESSION TO THE INDIAN ENVIRONMENT

During the early centuries of its residence in India, Islam made a determined struggle to maintain its purity, and to extend the faith to the last man of the land: Both proved to be unsuccessful. The Qur'ān never really began to supplant the Vedas, but, on the contrary, the very faith (īmān) and practice (dīn) of Islam became modified to a serious extent among large sections of the ever-growing community. The first change to be noted began to show itself very early. The ¹ Nicholson, The Mystics of Islam, 16 ff.; see also Horten, Indische Strömungen, etc., 4, note; 17 ff.

² Goldziher, op. cit., 176.

³ Nicholson, op. cit., 16.

⁴ Goldziher, op. cit., 176, 177.

Muslim armies of Muḥammad b. Quāsim, in the eighth century, were forced to realize that the fundamental law of no quarter for idolaters could not possibly be carried out to the letter. The people would not accept Islam by any such forceful methods as were offered to them, even though their temples were destroyed, many of their priests slain, and their fighting men put to the sword. To be sure, there were cases here and there of mass-conversion through fear or hope of reward; but the hold of the Brāhmanic religion on the people was too strong and subtle to be shaken entirely by fear or favour. Further, the forces that could be brought from a foreign country at any one time were not sufficient to police such a large country and such an enormous population, and bring them to accept Islam through fear of superior power.

It therefore became necessary to yield to the force of circumstances, and accord to the polytheistic and idolatrous Hindus the status of dhimmīs, or those under protection of the Muslim State, as was permitted by the law in the case of people to whom a Scripture had been given, such as Jews, Christians, and Magians. This was in itself a marked concession, and marks the first change in Muslim practice, on a large scale, that of necessity came to be adopted in India as a regular policy.

Following this decision, it became necessary to make as much special provision as possible for the maintenance of the purity of Islamic faith and customs. Idolaters and idolatrous practices were regarded with horror and contempt. All the vocabulary of abuse that could be summoned for their description was commonly used by zealots, even down to the close of Aurangzib's reign. Thus it was always in good form to use such epithets and phrases as 'the filth of infidelity', the 'thorn of god-plurality', 'the impurity of idol-worship', of which many historians make all too frequent use.¹ Since this was the attitude of the Muslims toward the inhabitants of the land whither they had come, it is little wonder that a policy of separation was adopted in order to preserve purity of faith. Consequently, we find the early invaders like Muḥammad b. Quāsim, in Sind, building cantonments for the Muslims, apart from the cities they captured.

¹ Ḥasan Niẓāmī, E.D., II, 217.

HINDU INFLUENCE IN GOVERNMENT AND ARMY

Gradually, however, Hindu influence began to creep in and to make itself felt within the camp. Brāhmins, we are told, were appointed to be the collectors of the poll-tax (jizyah).¹ After the Ghaznawid conquests and the establishment of a settled Muslim rule in Delhi, the emperors not only began to make use of Hindus to an increasing extent in the government of the country, but Hindu princes, who had come into favour with the Muslim rulers, became useful allies, and employed their Hindu troops in the service of the Muslim authority. In fact, the wars with the Hindus in different parts of the country undoubtedly did much to increase the respect of the Muslim for the inhabitants of India, and to break down the overbearing and unreasonable attitude of intolerance which he had adopted at first. Thus we not only read of Hindu troops being employed by Muslim rulers, but that men of both religions freely began to enter each other's service. Elphinstone relates how the flower of the Muslim king of Malwa's army, during an invasion of the Bahmanī territories, was said to have consisted of twelve thousand Afghāns and Rājputs; while Deo Rāj, Rājā of Bijaynagar, recruited Muslims, assigned lands to their chiefs, and built a mosque at his capital expressly for their encouragement.² Furthermore, when 'Alā-ud-Dīn, at the close of the thirteenth century, made his unauthorized expedition to south India, he seems to have excited no comment when he asserted, by way of a pretext, on his advance, that he was on his way to enter the service of the Hindu Rājā of Rājāmandrī.³

While Hindus thus came to be used for certain minor posts in the work of administration at a very early date, it was not until the time of Akbar that they were employed even in the highest offices. Among the officials whom he employed to be intimately associated with himself in the government of his empire were Rājā Todar Mal and Rājā Birbal. The former was a Kayasth by caste, from the Punjab. He showed such skill in revenue work that Akbar made him his minister of finance. He was also one of the emperor's trusted military commanders.¹ Birbal, though a Hindu, was elevated to the rank of prime minister, and became the emperor's greatest personal favourite. Birbal's name has become a household word in north India, and many are the amusing anecdotes that are told concerning Akbar and his close personal Hindu friend. That these two Hindu officials had a great influence on the government appointments cannot for a moment be doubted; and the selection of Hindus, who had become very proficient in Persian, was so increased and extended that when Aurangzib came to the throne we find him confronted with an awkward problem when he endeavoured to exclude Hindus entirely from holding public office.²

¹ Chach-nāmah, E.D., 184.

² Elphinstone, op. cit., 475.

³ Ibid., 388.

EFFECT OF SOCIAL CONTACTS

Not alone in the matter of military and administrative affairs do we find a gradual 'letting down of the bars' and association with Hindus on equal terms. More important still, for its effect on Islam, was the gradual encroachment of social contacts, that could not by any artificial process for long be avoided. I refer particularly to contacts through marriage. Though the Muslim invader may have regarded the religion of the idolaters with disgust, this feeling did not extend to their women, and Muḥammad b. Quāsīm had no hesitancy whatever in sending the two daughters of the Hindu Rājā Dāhir to Baṣrah, to become harem inmates of his superior, Hajjāj; nor was there any aversion shown to keeping the Hindu women of the conquered warriors of the cities and towns as slaves. Jahāngīr gives a characteristic expression to this feeling which existed in connexion with some practices among certain imperfect Muslim brethren, whom he encountered at Pāmpur, in Kashmir. He found them marrying their daughters to the Hindus and taking daughters from them, so he comments by saying, 'As for taking, it does not so much matter; but as for giving their own daughters—heaven protect us!'³

¹ Ibid., 510 f.

² Bakhtāwar Khān, E.D., VII, 159.

³ Wāqī'āt-i-Jahāngiri, E.D., VI, 376.

One of the earliest and most famous of the Hindu-Muslim alliances was that which occurred in A.D. 1306 between 'Alā-ud-Dīn Khaljī and the beautiful Kaulā Devī, wife of the Rājā of Gujarāt. But such mixed marriages were not confined to royalty. In fact, they appear to have formed a part of the policy of absorption and domination by which it was hoped Hinduism would be overthrown. Consequently, the practice became well established, and it has contributed largely to the increase in the Muslim population.

It was, however, a doubtful advantage, for the Hindu wives brought with them many strange customs and practices, which had a profound effect on succeeding generations of Indian Muslims. What this effect has been may be inferred, to a certain extent, from the practices in which the women indulged in the Imperial Zanānah of Akbar. This is no doubt an extreme case, due to the unwonted liberality of the emperor; but just because of that liberality we are permitted to see all the more easily what must have taken place, more or less secretly perhaps, in every home throughout the land where a Muslim husband had taken a Hindu wife. This would sometimes react on the husband's views towards Hindus and their religion, to say nothing of the influence of the Hindu mother on her Hindu-Muslim children. It is recorded that Akbar, 'from his earliest youth, in compliment to his wives, the daughters of the Rājās of Hind, had within the female apartments continued to burn the hom (sacred fire)'.¹ Even the austere and fanatical Aurangzīb had two Hindu wives, but apparently their faith made no difference to him.² The practice of making such unions still goes on; for I know personally of more than one prominent family of northern India where the relationship with certain Hindu families is not only clearly traced, but inter-marriages still take place. Among the lower classes the practice is said to be very extended, usually growing out of illicit relations.

MUSLIM PIRS AND HINDU DISCIPLES

Another very curious relationship with the Hindus, which has not been without its effect on Islam in India, has been

¹ Budāyūnī, E.D., V, 530.

² Bernier, op. cit., 126.

the fact that many Muslim pīrs had Hindu disciples; and, similarly, some Hindu yogīs have had Muslim chelās. Sir T. W. Arnold tells us that 'instances are not unknown of friendship between saints of the rival creeds. At Girot, in the Punjab, the tombs of two ascetics, Jamāli Sultan and Diyāl Bhāwan, who lived in close amity during the early part of the nineteenth century, stand close to one another, and are revered by Hindus and Muḥammadans alike. Bāwā Fattū (1700), a Muslim saint, whose tomb is at Rānītāl, in the Kāngra district, received the gift of prophecy by the blessing of a Hindu saint, Sodhī Gurū Gulāb Singh. On the other hand, Bābā Shāhānā, a Hindu saint whose cult is observed in the Jang district, is said to have been the chelā, or spiritual disciple, of a Muslim faqīr, who changed the original name, Mihra, of his Hindu follower, into Mīr Shāh.'¹

THE CHANGING ATTITUDE TO INDIAN CULTURE

Before proceeding to trace the effect of the foregoing contacts on the development of Islam in India and Pakistan attention must be paid to the influence of Hindu thought and culture on the Muslim mind. The antipathy of the Muslim invaders and many of the rulers to things Indian appears as one of the outstanding characteristics of those unpleasant times. Although Islam under the 'Abbāsids had been the patron of letters and culture, even to the extent of welcoming translations of books on Buddhist and Indian philosophy and science within the ever-growing circle of their literature; and although al-Bīrūnī, a contemporary of Maḥmūd of Ghaznī in the eleventh century, showed a profound interest in, and clear understanding of, Indian sciences, philosophies, and religions; yet there was a period of more than five centuries before Akbar arose to take al-Bīrūnī's place with an attempt to turn the tide in favour of Indian culture.

Al-Bīrūnī was an altogether exceptional man, not only for his own time but for any time. He certainly was not the product of his age. He had no praise for the expeditions of Maḥmūd of Ghaznī, but spoke of him as having 'utterly ruined the prosperity of the country, and performed there wonderful exploits, by which Hindus became like atoms of dust scattered in all directions. . . . Their scattered remains cherish, of course, the most inveterate aversion towards all Muslims. This is the reason, too, why Hindu sciences have retired away from those parts of the country conquered by us, and have fled to places which our hand cannot reach—to Kashmir, Benares, and other places.¹ He was not much interested in the holy wars of Maḥmūd, but preferred to engage himself in making diligent inquiry into the manners, customs, and beliefs of the Hindus. To this end he had to acquire Sanskrit, and he clearly recognized that he stood alone in his inquiries regarding the Indians. The marvellous extent of his researches, and his interest in Hindu thought, may be roughly indicated by reference to the sources which he used. In his account of theology and philosophy he made use of the Sāṅkhya, by Kapila, the Bhagavad Gītā, and the Purānas. His sources for his chapters on astronomy, geography, and astrology include twenty-two different Sanskrit titles.² Unfortunately, however, al-Bīrūnī's work produced no effect on the Muslim attitude toward Hindus, and it apparently went entirely unnoticed by them.³

¹ E.I., II, 490.

More than five hundred years after al-Bīrūnī, who left India in A.D. 1030, Akbar came to the throne, and set about to cultivate, in an entirely new and unheard-of manner, associations with his Hindu subjects. It was a part of his governmental policy to effect a fusion of the two great elements of Indian religious and social life, and he did everything in his power to conciliate the Hindus, to affect their manners and customs, and to encourage the obliteration of difference between the two communities. Consequently, there was scarcely a department of his own private life in which some modification of the Islamic rule was not introduced. Although he was a man of the most meagre sort of education, yet he evinced the profoundest interest in Hindu religion and Philosophy, and in his time had translations made from the Sanskrit into Persian of the Athārva Veda, the Mahābhārata, and the Rāmāyaṇa.¹

¹ Al-Bīrūnī, India, Sachau, I, 22.

² Cf. Sachau, Preface to al-Bīrūnī's India, I, xxxix.

³ However, it must not be overlooked that certain evidences of the effect of the Indian environment on Muslim life early became apparent. This is noticeable in literature especially. For instance, in the poetry of Amīr Khusrū, of the Tughluq period, adaptation to the Indian mode is found; and to him, it is said, the origin of the modern Urdū language can be traced. The greatest influence of environment is found, of course, in the Mughul period. The metaphors are changed, the similes are taken from Indian birds and seasons, and in fact from the whole of Indian life.

All of these contacts with the Hindu environment gradually tended to produce an attitude of tolerance among the Muslims of India, which has given to Indian Islam some peculiar characteristics. Further proofs of this are found in the terms of a confidential will which Bābur left to his son Humāyūn, the original copy of which is preserved in the State Library at Bhopāl. The document, as translated, runs as follows :

O my son : People of diverse religions inhabit India ; and it is a matter of thanksgiving to God that the King of kings has entrusted the government of this country to you. It therefore behoves you that :

1. You should not allow religious prejudices to influence your mind, and administer impartial justice, having due regard to the religious susceptibilities and religious customs of all sections of the people.

2. In particular refrain from the slaughter of cows, which will help you to obtain a hold on the hearts of the people of India. Thus you will bind the people of the land to yourself by ties of gratitude.

3. You should never destroy the places of worship of any community and always be justice-loving, so that relations between the king and his subjects may remain cordial and there be peace and contentment in the land.

4. The propagation of Islam will be better carried on with the sword of love and obligation than with the sword of oppression.

5. Always ignore the mutual dissension of Shī'ahs and Sunnis, otherwise they will lead to the weakness of Islam.

6. Treat the different peculiarities of your subjects as the different seasons of the year, so that the body politic may remain free from disease.²

AKBAR'S ADOPTION OF HINDU BELIEFS AND PRACTICES

Akbar not only put an end to the killing of cows, but did more than Bābur suggests, and abolished the hated jizyah.³ He went still further. Under the influence of his Hindu wives and his beloved wazīr, Rājā Birbal, he began to worship the sun; he wore clothes that in colour corresponded to the ruling planet of the day; he began at midnight to mutter spells which the Hindus taught him, in an endeavour to make the sun serve his wishes; he was even known to appear in public with his forehead marked as a Hindu, and celebrated the festivals of Raksha Bandhan and Diwālī. He even refrained from eating meat on certain days. These observances were also followed to some extent by Jahāngīr; but Shāh Jahān began to make changes; and with Aurangzib the pendulum swung entirely in the opposite direction.¹

¹ 'Abd-ul-Quādir Budāyūnī, E.D., V, 483.

² Dr. Syed Maḥmud, The Indian Review, Aug. 1923, 499.

³ See p. 27.

Akbar's leanings, and the practices which he actually adopted, and sought to bring his Muslim subjects to follow in their relations to Hindus, ultimately produced a profound effect on his own religious thought. During the course of his reign, too, he was greatly influenced in his religious thinking by two men, Abū'l-Faḍl and his brother Fayḍī, sons of the heretically-inclined Shaykh Mubarak Nāgorī. They held a liberal attitude toward Hinduism, and religion in general, that led them to be regarded by the orthodox as arch-heretics, who were the cause of the emperor's being led astray.

It is doubtful, however, if the turning of Akbar from orthodoxy can be laid to the blame of these two favourites of his. Rather, it may be said they were the two congenial friends, whose minds ran along with his, who furthered the ends he had in mind. Akbar's tolerant spirit found frequent opportunity for displeasure with the 'Pharaoh-like pride' of the 'ulamā' at court, which ran counter to his personal feelings and the government policy which he desired should prevail in the empire. Blochmann, who has carefully studied the relations between Akbar and Abū'l-Faḍl, says that he was affected most deeply by the religious persecutions and sentences of death passed by his chief justice, Makhḍūm-ul-Mulk, on Shi'ahs and other heretics. He began to realize that the 'Scribes and Pharisees formed a power of their own in his kingdom, at the construction of which he had for twenty years been working'. During this time he had resolved upon ruling, 'with an even hand, men of every creed in his dominion'. He was, however, being continually urged by the learned lawyers to 'persecute instead of heal', and as a result he instituted the Thursday evening discussions in the audience hall, or 'ibādat khānah, at Fathpūr Sikrī, which he had erected especially for this purpose.¹

¹ 'Abd-ul-Quādir Budāyūnī, E.D., V, 530 ff.; E.I., II, 490.

It is thought that these discussions were inaugurated by Akbar solely for the purpose of trying to discover whether or not he was in error in his policy, and because he felt it his duty as a ruler to inquire. If this be so, the results went even farther than Akbar probably anticipated, to the dismay and consternation of the orthodox party, who no doubt from the very first feared the outcome. And little wonder that they should fear the effect of such an open forum, where night after night the emperor listened to the views of the theologians of various religions, including Hindu pandits, Parsees, Roman Catholic priests from Goa, as well as the learned maulvīs of the different schools.

The first obvious result of the discussions was that the outward unity of the learned Muslim 'ulamā' at once began to disappear. Akbar's doubts, therefore, increased instead of being cleared up. In certain points of law the Hanafite school seemed to lag behind that of the other three schools of Muslim jurisprudence; while even 'the moral character of the Prophet was scrutinized and found wanting'.² Thus the discussions led to Akbar's disillusionment, and the great discomfiture of the orthodox party, who were in constant opposition. Finally, it is said that Abū'l-Faḍl, pointing out the divisions among the 'ulamā', persuaded the emperor that a subject ought to look upon the king not alone as the temporal but also as the only spiritual guide.

This, however, was a new doctrine, in direct opposition to the received opinion in Islam, where the law stands above every king, and makes the promulgation of a national constitution impossible. In cases where kings such as 'Alā-ud-Dīn Khaljī had before tried to assert the law of expediency above the Qur'ānic law, they never actually managed to bring about the separation of religion and law, and make the administration of the civil government independent of the mullā. The seeds of division had, however, been sown; and so, when

¹ H. Blochmann, Introduction to Ā'in-i-Akbari, viii.

² Ibid.

Abū'l-Faḍl forced the issue at one of the Thursday evening meetings, after four years of unrest and discussion, he 'raised a perfect storm'. Up to this point the disputations had been confined to the life of Muḥammad or the differences between the sects; they now began to turn on the very principles of Islam itself.¹

The outcome was a complete personal triumph for Akbar. The 'ulamā' were put down, and, much to their disgust, were forced to sign Akbar's famous 'decree of infallibility',² which, as a state document, 'stands unique in the whole history of Islam'. There followed the banishment of Makhdūm-ul-Mulk and his associate 'Abd-un-Nabī, and the disputations were brought to an end, and Akbar was now free to proceed to develop his religious notions as he pleased.³

Budāyūnī describes the events of this period in vivid detail, and assigns still another reason for Akbar's innovation in religion. He had become convinced that a period of one thousand years was to be the duration of the religion of Islam; and, as that period was all but completed, no obstacle prevented his making the innovation, as he was now independent of the shaykhs and 'ulamā'. He had even come to the place where he was ready to make public use of the formula, 'There is no God but God, and Akbar is God's apostle', but was too fearful of the consequences actually to do so. However, he did proclaim the establishment of his new religion, which he called Tawḥīd-i-Ilāhī, or Divine Monotheism. While it is Islamic in an external sense it is in fact a complete denial of Islam, for it substituted an entirely different ceremonial law, as well as new theological doctrines. In the latter the Ṣūfī idea of absorption of the soul in the Divine Being is prominent, while in the former the Zoroastrian contribution is quite apparent in the central position occupied by the worship of the sacred fire, which was made over to the charge of Abū'l-Faḍl, the high-priest, who was instructed to take care that it was never extinguished.¹

¹ Ibid.

² 'If there be a variance of opinion among mujtahids (divines) upon a question of religion, and His Majesty, in his penetrating understanding and unerring judgment should incline to one opinion . . . and give his decree for the benefit of mankind, and for the due regulation of the world, we do hereby agree that such a decree is binding on us, and on the whole nation.' Signed by the principal 'ulamā' of the court. Budāyūnī, Muntakhab-ut-Tawārikh, E.D., V, 532; see p. 70.

³ H. Blochmann, op. cit., viii.

Akbar's governmental policy of seeking a closer identification of Muslims with Hindus in one great commonwealth undoubtedly did produce an effect which was good and wholesome ; but, so far as his attempt to bring about the introduction of a new religion was concerned, it may be said that the effort died with him. It was in no sense intended as a reform of Islam, but was an actual denial of it. In closing this study of Akbar, I shall quote the pertinent observations of Goldziher, who says his innovation was a break with the traditions of Islam 'more decided even than that which manifests itself in the doctrine of Ismā'il. It remained, therefore, without any decided influence on the development of Islam. Limited to the court circles and to the intellectuals, it did not outlive its founders. . . . Without violent disturbance, orthodox Islam resumed its former control after Akbar's death (A.D. 1605), and it is not until we come to the latest rationalistic movement among Brāhmans and Moslems in Anglo-India that we find Akbar proclaimed as the precursor of the effort to bring Brāhmanism, Parseeism and Islam into closer touch.'²

DĀRĀ SHIKŪH AND HINDU-MUSLIM UNITY

The effect of such close associations with Hindus as were practised and advocated by Akbar could not but be passed on to some extent ; and, as a matter of fact, the mantle of the liberal-minded emperor fell upon his grandson, Dārā Shikūh. If this prince had not been summarily executed on a charge of heresy, he might have lived to exert still further influence in support of the cause of Hindu-Muslim unity. During his life he gave himself to the acquiring of knowledge about the religion and philosophy of the Hindus, particularly on the mystic side ; and to this purpose he not only read and translated Sanskrit books into Persian, but assiduously sought the company of Hindu ascetics. The books that he had

¹ 'Abd-ul-Qādir Budāyūnī, E.D., V, 530 ff.

² Goldziher, op. cit., 328-30.

translated include the Rāmāyaṇa and the Gītā, the Upanishāds, under the title Sirr-ul-Asrār, and the Yogavashishta.¹

Contemporary orthodox opinion about Dārā and his fraternization with Hindus does not do him justice ; but it was time for the pendulum to swing, and Dārā had to pay the price for his attempt to pioneer in the realm of religious unity. His conception, after much study and contemplation, was that between Hindu and Muslim mysticism there exists only verbal differences, and he wrote his *Majma'-ul-Baḥrayn*² to show 'where' the 'two seas' of mystic thought 'meet'. But the orthodox Muslims, who had regained their control, would have none of it, as may be seen from the following comment by an historian :

Dārā Shikūh in his later days did not restrict himself to the free-thinking and heretical notions which he had adopted under the name of tasawwuf (Ṣūfism), but showed an inclination for the religion and institutions of the Hindus. He was constantly in the society of Brāhmans, yogis, and sannyāsīs, and he used to regard these worthless teachers of delusions as learned and true masters of wisdom. He considered their books, which they call Bed (Vedas), as being the Word of God, and revealed from heaven, and he called them ancient and excellent books, in the translation of which he was much employed. Instead of the sacred name of Allāh he adopted the Hindu name Prabhū (lord) . . . and he had this name engraved in Hindi letters upon his rings. . . . Through these perverted opinions he had given up the prayers, fasting, and other obligations imposed by the law, and . . . it became manifest that if Dārā Shikūh obtained the throne, and established his power, the foundations of the faith would be in danger, and the precepts of Islam would be changed for the rant of infidelity (Hinduism) and Judaism.³

He was finally condemned for heresy, and put to death, in A.D. 1659, by Aurangzīb, his own brother.

LATER DEVELOPMENTS

While Akbar and Dārā Shikūh made little headway with liberalizing Islamic thought in their day, and incurred naught but displeasure, yet the same influence of contact with ¹ R.M.M., LXIII, 1926, 5.

² For text and translation with full account of Dārā Shikūh see Majma'-ul-Baḥrayn, ed. and tr. M. Mahfuz-ul-Haq, Asiatic Society of Bengal, 1929.

³ Muḥammad Kāzim, E.D., VII, 179.

Hinduism that led them into strange vagaries of thought, and away from the central conceptions of Islam, has produced a liberality of attitude regarding Hindu gods and scriptures in some modern minds that is truly amazing. There are those who declare that the Hindu gods, Rāma and Kṛishṇa, should be regarded as prophets, and the Vedas, the Rāmāyaṇa, the Bhagavad Gītā, for instance, as gifts of divine revelation, basing their argument on the Qur'ānic texts, which say, 'And every people hath its guide';¹ and, 'To every people we have sent an apostle'.² The most modern and persistent exponents of this doctrine are the Aḥmadiyah propagandists, who make frequent reference to it in their publications. The editor of one of their papers, published in Lahore, in answer to a question of a correspondent on this point, gives his position thus :

'The Qur'ān says that every nation has seen its warner; hence India, too, must have received revelation. As the Vedas and Gītā are held in great reverence as divine books, we assume that these were revealed to the prophets who appeared in this country.'³ In another place the editor affirms his belief that probably Rāma and Kṛishṇa were prophets, since it is not necessary to know the names of all the prophets.⁴ For we cannot assume that they should be excluded simply because the Qur'ān does not mention them, when at the same time it does enunciate 'the principle that every nation has seen its warner or apostle'.⁵ It is simply inconceivable that such a large country as India would have been excluded from the manifestation of God's grace.

Other proofs of an amazing unorthodoxy and extreme liberality of attitude toward Hindu polytheists, which would have shocked the strict Aurangzib beyond measure, may be found in the Muslim poets of Bengal, such as Karam 'Alī and Karīm Allāh, who sang the praises of Rādhā and Kṛishṇa, and composed hymns in honour of the goddess Kālī.⁶ On one occasion, in Bijnor, in north India, when trouble was

¹ Sūrah, XIII, 7.

² Ibid., XVI, 36.

³ The Light, Lahore, June 1, 1923, 4.

⁴ Cp. Al-Aqā'id an-Nasafi.

⁵ The Light, July 16, 1923, 4.

⁶ D. C. Sen, History of Bengali Language and Literature, 798, 799.

expected between the two communities on a certain Hindu festival, I remember the Muslim secretary of the municipal board told me that he sought to avoid it by having garlands made and sent to all the Hindu temples of the city, to be presented as offerings to the idols. While this was a mere matter of expediency rather than an indication of belief, it nevertheless shows to what length Muslims in the midst of their Hindu environment will sometimes go.

RESULTS OF INCOMPLETE CONVERSION

In a land like India, where the majority of the Muslim population has been recruited from Hindu caste and outcaste groups by mass conversion, whether from fear of military power, or to attain some desirable object, or because of persuasion, complete Islamization of the converts has not been accomplished. There are great sections of the Muslim community, here and there, which reveal their Hindu origin in their religious and social life almost at every turn, constituting a curious mixture of both. There is little wonder that this should be so. The Muslim armies moved over the country in wave after wave for centuries, from Peshawar to Dacca and beyond, and from the Himalayas to the southern end of the peninsula. It often happened that hastily converted peoples were left behind after the army moved on. These had been given but scant instruction in the new faith, and were left to remember and practise what they could. The pressure of the old idolatrous surroundings upon them was great. Not only their neighbours, but many of their relatives in other places were still Hindu. Little wonder that the worship of the village godlings went on as before, that animistic beliefs continued, that Brāhman priests were still employed, and Hindu festivals observed. The wonder is, not that these hereditary customs and beliefs were adhered to, but that any belief in Islam remained at all.

One of the earliest records we find of official recognition of the existence of mixed customs and beliefs among village Muslims occurred in the reign of Jahāngīr, when he was visiting Kashmir. Here, near the village of Pāmpur, on the Jhelum, it is said that he found at Rajaur some Muslims who were originally Hindus but that their chiefs were still styled Rājās. Hindu customs were still observed, such as the burning of widows, and intermarriage with Hindus was practised. This led to an attempt to mend matters; for the emperor issued orders prohibiting such practices in the future, and suitable 'punishments were enjoined for their infraction'.¹ However, from the evidences that are still found in certain quarters of Muslim India chiefly in the remote village areas, at a distance from the influence of the 'ulamā' it is apparent that all the king's horses and all the king's men were not able to bring about the desired reforms. Still, there is no doubt that the situation to-day is far better than it was a century ago, as a result of the reform efforts of Muslim preachers, the more general diffusion of education, and the extensive revival of the Islamic spirit and learning in connexion with the modern reform movements.

Let us now take a glance at a few of these groups that show the results of incomplete conversion, and then pass to a closer consideration of the main religious and social phenomena growing out of it. The Malkāna community is the best known of these groups in north India, a description of which I quote from Mr. Blunt, who was the United Provinces census officer for 1911. Concerning them he writes:

These are converted Hindus of various castes, belonging to Agra and adjoining districts, chiefly Muttra, Etah, and Mainpuri. They are of Rājput, Jāt, and Baniyā descent. They are reluctant to describe themselves as Muslims, and generally give their caste name, and scarcely recognize the name Malkāna. Their names are mostly Hindu; they mostly worship at Hindu temples; they use the salutation Rām, Rām, intermarry mostly among themselves only. On the other hand, they sometimes frequent a mosque, practise circumcision, bury their dead, and they will eat with Muslims if they are particular friends. They prefer to be addressed as Miyān Thākur. They admit they are neither Hindus nor Muslims, but a mixture of both.²

From Gujarāt, in western India, comes a similar story. The Momnās, or Memons, of Cutch are Shī'ahs in name, but they do not associate with Muslims, eat no flesh, do not practise circumcision, do not observe the stated prayers (ṣalāt) or the fast of Ramaḍān. Their salutation is Rām, ¹ Wāqī'āt-i-Jahāngiri, E.D., VI, 376.

² C.I.R., 1911, Vol. I, pt. 1, 118.

Rām; they worship the Hindu triad—Brahmā, Vishṇū, and Śiva—and consider Imām Shāh, the missionary who originally converted them some three centuries ago, as an incarnation of Brahmā.¹ The same sort of condition is likewise found in the Punjab, Bengal, central and southern India, among certain remote sections of the Muslim community.

In the religious life of the illiterate and partly-converted Muslim masses of the villages of India the remnants of earlier beliefs and practices form a long list, and we shall attempt now to give them in some detail. To begin with, sacred sites have been carried over into the new system, and have been invested with wholly arbitrary Muslim names and legends, just as happened in Palestine, where to-day we find such sacred mounts as Tell Asūr, in northern Judea, venerated by the Muslim population as highly as they were by the Jews and Canaanites, whom they followed. This transformation of sacred Hindu sites, or tirathas, is most commonly found in Kashmir, where they go by the name of 'ziyārat.' Sometimes it has been discovered that the tomb of a Muslim saint was formerly a Hindu temple. For instance, the tomb of Bāma Dīn Ṣāhid, in Kashmir, has been shown to have been originally a Hindu temple, built by Bhīma Sāhi, the last Hindu king of Kabul. The current legend, however, is that the saint was a Hindu ascetic, who, before his conversion to Islam, went by the name of Bhūma Sādhi.²

IDOLATROUS PRACTICES

The practices, however, that find greatest disfavour with strict Muslims are the idolatrous practices, and the worship of Hindu gods and godlings, which have prevailed to such an extent in the village life of Islam. While no attempt is made to give a complete list of all the objects or types of this adherence to polytheism, a few of the more prominent cases will be noticed. The Churihāras of Uttar Pradesh are said to worship Kalkā Sahjā Maī, and observe the shrādda ceremony of the Hindus.³ The Meos of the Punjab worship countless godlings, such as Siansi, Magti, and Lalchī. The Mirāsīs of

¹ C.I.R., 1911, VII, Bomboy, 59.

² E.I., II, 491.

³ C.I.R., 1911, XV, United Provinces, pt. I, 141.

Amritsar take offerings to Durgā Bhawānī. While Lakshmī Devī is worshipped by the Turk-Nawas of eastern Bengal.¹ Among the Dudekulas of the Madras Presidency tools are worshipped, as is done by the Hindus at the Dasehra festival. Saint worship is common everywhere, and in some places great reverence is paid to Shaykh Saddū, which is, without doubt, demon worship. Evil spirits are avoided by the use of charms (ta'widh) bound on the arm or neck, and the use of magic (sīhr); while fortune-telling, under the name of geomancy ('ilm-ur-raml), astrology, the magic square, opening the Qur'ān for guidance, and the like, are employed by all classes.²

The belief in the spirits or godlings that cause disease is probably the most difficult of all to eradicate, and has met with the most stubborn opposition. While many idolatrous practices have been given up, as the census reports and personal observation bear witness, yet in times of sickness and plague we find Muslims in the villages, especially women, going pathetically to the shrines, seeking every known means to secure healing or immunity from disease. When a child is attacked with the dread disease, smallpox, medicine as a rule is not given, for fear of offending the goddess Śītalā. In the eastern Punjab 'the assistance of the female attendant of the Śītalā temple is requisitioned, offerings being given away according to her suggestion, with a view to pleasing the goddess and saving the life of the patient'.³ The use of the scapegoat for ridding a village of a plague is not altogether uncommon.⁴

Brāhmins are used as family priests, as, for instance, by the Avans of the north-west corner of the Punjab, and their brother Muslim Bhāts of Uttar Pradesh.⁵ Special reverence is shown for the cow among the Shīns of the Indus valley, who will not eat beef. The same is true of the Momnās of Cutch.⁶ While Bābur and Akbar did not affect any special

¹ H. H. Risley, T.C.B., I, 309.

² Herklots, op. cit., 218 ff.

³ C.I.R., 1911, Punjab, pt. I, 174.

⁴ Crooke, P.R.F.L., I, 91.

⁵ Bains, Ethnography, 44; C.I.R., United Provinces, 1911, pt. I, 141.

⁶ C.I.R., 1911, VII, Bombay, pt. I, 59.

reverence for the cow as such, yet the former, as we have seen, recommended that his son Humāyūn respect Hindu feelings in this matter, and Akbar went so far as to prohibit the killing of cows altogether by Muslims. Jahāngīr also prohibited their slaughter for a period of years, because of the shortage of cattle.¹

Ascetics among Muslims are occasionally found who observe tonsure and smearing of the body with ashes, as practised among Hindus. They are also found as the guardians of sacred shrines which are worshipped by both Hindus and Muḥammadans, as in the case of Sakhī Sarwar, in the Punjab.

The sacred fire is also found. At the shrine of Ṣādiq Nihang, in the Jhang district, in the West Punjab, the Muslim faqīrs keep a fire going night and day, called dhūni. Once a year, on the occasion of the 'urs of the saint, a large loaf of bread, called a rot, is cooked with this sacred fire, and is then broken up and distributed to all present.² Another example of the sacred fire is at the Imāmbārah in Gorakhpur. According to Crooke, it was first started by a renowned Shī'ah faqīr, named Roshan 'Alī, and has been maintained unquenched for more than a hundred years, a special body of attendants and supplies of wood being provided for it. It is respected by Hindus as well as Muḥammadans, and, as in the case of fires kept up by noted yogīs, the ashes have a reputation for the cure of fever.³

Many Muslims are found to join with their Hindu neighbours in their festivals, as their ancestors did from time immemorial, before they adopted Islam. Among those festivals that one can commonly find observed by village Muslims are the Holī and Diwālī, and even the Hindu New Year's day, Baisākhī, while Basant-panchamī was officially adopted by the Shī'ah kings of Oudh as the time for their Nau-roz celebration.⁴ Akbar's and Jahāngīr's adherence to certain Hindu festivals we have already noted.

¹ Bernier, op. cit., 326.

² C.I.R., Punjab, 1911, pt. I, 175.

³ Crooke, op. cit., I, 312.

⁴ Herklots, op. cit., 191.

HINDU INFLUENCE IN SOCIAL LIFE

The social life of many Muslim groups is honeycombed with Hindu customs and observances. This is clearly revealed in names. The Avans of the Punjab, for instance, though they are nearly all Muslims, retain Hindu names and keep their genealogies in the Brāhmanic fashion.¹ Hindu titles are also found; for instance, among the converts from the Tagā Brāhmans of the western part of Uttar Pradesh the title Chaudharī is kept in prominent families; and at Lucknow we find important Muslim princes bearing such titles as the Māhārājā of Mahmūdābād, and the Rājā of Jahāngī-rābād.

In marriage certain groups, that are Muslim in name only, either use the Hindu ceremony alone, or may perform the ceremony first by Hindu rites and then call in a quādī to perform the Muslim ceremony. In some sections, for example in Mysore, among Muslims the joint-family system of the Hindus obtains in the rural areas.² In fact, the principle has been quite generally established that in matters of inheritance, dowry, and the like, Muslim converts may adhere legally, as they do in many cases in fact, to the tribal customs or customary law of the group to which they or their ancestors belonged before conversion.

CASTE IN MUSLIM SOCIETY

In the social sphere the influence of Hinduism on Islam has nowhere left a more definite mark than in the creation of caste distinctions, which indicate social status as clearly as they do in Hindu society. As the existence of numerous sectarian divisions is deplored on the religious side by the modern reformers and leaders of the Muslim community, so also are the equally numerous social divisions, which tend to prevent the welding of the Muslims into a single brotherhood, according to the Islamic ideal. It is true that one reason for the spread of Islam in India was the elevation in social status that came from the breaking of the bondage and oppression of the Hindu caste system, and the freedom which Islam had to offer in its social system. But in the working out of the practical difficulties attending adjustment within the social structure of Islam there were in India handicaps to unity and brotherhood which Islam had never before encountered.

¹ Bains, op. cit., 44.

² C.I.R., Mysore, 1911, 61.

First, there were the foreign Muslims, the Arabs, Turks, and Persians, who were at the top of the social scale from the very start because of their position as rulers and the various places they held in the army and government. They had no doubts as to their superiority over the local converts; and in this very attitude we can see the beginnings of a Muslim caste system. Secondly, as the converts from various classes and castes of Hindus came in, from Brāhmans and Rājputs to the lowest outcastes, and as the lower caste groups continued to live mostly in their ancestral villages, it was inevitable that there should continue among these Hindu converts the same general feeling of aloofness the one from the other. This was especially true as many of these converts changed their beliefs and customs but little from what they were before. Therefore, to-day it is not astonishing that we should find it the common practice to regard Muslims as belonging to two social groups: the 'Sharīf zāts' (high castes) and the 'ajlāf zāts' (low castes).

In fact, to such an extent does the Hindu idea of a fourfold social division prevail, that is: Brāhman, Kshatriya, Vaishya, and Śūdra, that in some parts of the country converts to Islam consider that they are bound to enroll themselves as either Sayyid, Shaykh, Mughul, or Pathān.¹ This is not the place to go into the matter of racial origins, but it may be stated that the present-day social significance that attaches to these names has a definite racial and historical basis. The terms Sayyid and Shaykh imply Arabian origin; the former being used exclusively for descendants of the Prophet's family through his daughter Fāṭimah, and the latter being used to designate any other of Arab origin. The name Mughul ranks next in importance, because the ruling dynasties at Delhi rank next to those of Arabian origin, which was the nation of the Prophet. Incidentally, the term Mughul includes those of Turkish origin, as the Mughuls of Delhi were not in fact Mughuls or Mongols at all, but Turks, and this term came to be used in order to distinguish these Islamic rulers from the Ottoman rulers in Turkey. The term Pathān is used to apply, broadly speaking, to all who have had their origin in Afghanistan and the neighbourhood of the great North-West Frontier. In addition, these groups have their subdivisions, based on family and tribal origins.

¹ Bains, Ethnography, 139.

One other fact, too, needs to be mentioned. No one pretends any longer that those who give themselves one of the four abovementioned designations are all of them necessarily of the origin indicated by the name. There is a strong tendency for the converts from among the Hindus to assume a position in one of the recognized groups of sharīf zāts just as soon as practicable. The one that is most affected by such converts is one of the two that imply Arab origin, namely Shaykh. However, there is another explanation for the assumption of this title, which probably gives a more correct interpretation of the reason for its use. The term Shaykh is widely used as a term of respect for an old man, a learned man, or a great man; hence many converts, who had nothing in their origin to boast of, adopted this respectable designation, and so have formed into a separate caste.¹ However, not all converts have assumed one of the fourfold classifications. This is particularly true of the agricultural and high caste converts. The Rājputs, Jāts, and Ahirs for the most part retain their identity on embracing Islam, and one of the important Muslim families of Oudh still keeps the original caste title Thākur along with the title of Nawāb. Brāhmans may assume the title Sayyid on conversion, which course is said to have been approved by the Emperor Akbar.² Converts from the lower caste Hindus and outcastes as a rule go by the name of Nau-Muslims, or newly converted Muslims, and must remain in this probationary status for a time, their further advance being dependent on conduct or prosperity. Thus an old saying is to the point, 'Last year I was a Julāhā (weaver); this year a Shaykh; and next year, if the harvest be good, I shall be a Sayyid'. This practice of adopting a tribal designation is said to be based on a tradition from the Prophet to the effect: 'All converts to my faith are of me and my tribe.'³

¹ C.I.R., Punjab, 1911, 75.

² Bains, op. cit., 140.

³ Ibid.

There is a wide range of caste names found in the second division of Muslims, such as Julāhā, Telī, Bhāt, Jogīs, and the like. Most of them indicate occupation, as the Telī, who makes oil (tel). Most of them are just the old Hindu caste or guild name carried over. Not only do caste names prevail, but many of the original caste prejudices as well, in respect of eating, drinking, and marriage. There is even a caste, called the Kalāl, in north India, which engages in liquor dealing, quite contrary to the precepts of the faith; but in spite of this some of the men of this class have become prominent in public affairs.

One thing which is very creditable indeed is that, though caste may be recognized in social relations, yet when it comes to worship all the influence of Brāhman exclusiveness disappears, and in the mosque the Islamic ideal of brotherhood is triumphant; the beggar, the sweeper, and the prince worship side by side.

ATTEMPTS TO SOLVE THE CASTE PROBLEM

Caste in Islam presents a serious problem. This, together with the religious divisions, which are undoubtedly more numerous here than in any other country of the Muslim world, cause the leaders of the community no little concern. I cannot do better than bring this matter to a conclusion by letting the foremost Muslim philosopher of India the late Sir Muḥammad Iqbāl, of Lahore, sum up the situation as he presented it to his co-religionists some years ago, and which, for the most part, still holds good:

Is the organic unity of Islam intact in this land? Religious adventurers set up different sects and fraternities, ever quarreling with one another; and there are castes and sub-castes like the Hindus! Surely we have out-Hindued the Hindu himself; we are suffering from a double caste system—the religious caste system, sectarianism, and the social caste system, which we have either learned or inherited from the Hindus. This is one of the quiet ways in which the conquered nations revenge themselves on their conquerors.

Islam is one and indivisible. It brooks no distinctions in it. There are no Wāhābīs, Shī'āhs, Mirzāīs, or Sunnīs in Islam. Fight not for the interpretation of the truth when the truth itself is in danger. Let all come forward and contribute their respective shares in the great toil of the nation. Let the idols of class-distinctions and sectarianism be smashed for ever; let the Musulmans of the country be once more united into a great vital whole. How can we, in the presence of violent internal disputes, expect to succeed in persuading others to our way of thinking? The work of freeing humanity from superstition—the ultimate ideal of Islam as a community, for the realization of which we have done so little in this great land of myth and superstition—will ever remain undone if the emancipators themselves are becoming gradually enchained in the very fetters from which it is their mission to set others free.¹

INFLUENCE ON HINDUISM

If the Indian environment has produced a profound effect on Islam during its long residence in the country, it is no less true that Islam has in turn reacted on Hinduism and Indian life. It is impossible to pursue this investigation far; nor is it necessary, for it has already been done by others; but, that the picture may be fairly complete, we should see at any rate in what directions this influence was felt, and observe the present status of relationships between the two communities.

As wave after wave of invasion from the plateaus of central Asia swept over northern India from the year A.D. 1000 to 1400, Hinduism, maimed and bleeding, fled, in the person of its priests and scholars, from before the iconoclastic conquerors, and sought hiding, first in Kashmir and Benares, and later in Bengal, endeavouring by every means possible to preserve itself.² Their sacred books were kept hidden with much care, 'lest they should fall into the hands of Moslems and be burnt, as frequently happened'.³ Not only so, but it is related that, during Muḥammad Bakhtyār's invasion of Bihar, in one place, where he slew all the men, some religious books were discovered, but not a soul could be found who could read them, as all the pandits had been put to the sword.⁴ Confronted with such a foe as this, it is no wonder that Hinduism underwent a blight for a period of about four hundred years.

During this time we find large numbers of Muslim Sūfīs entering India. Two, at least, of the foremost religious ¹ Hindustan Review, quoted in C.I.R., 1911, XIV, Punjab, pt. I, 165.

² Al-Bīrūnī, India, tr. Sachau, I, 22.

³ Bernier, Travels, 336.

⁴ Minhāj as-Sirāj, E.D., II, 306.

orders, the Chishtī and Suhrawardī, were introduced ; and, as we have seen, it was not uncommon for Hindus to become the disciples of Muslim saints and vice versa. In fact, it was through Ṣūfism that Islam really found a point of contact with Hinduism and an effective 'entrance to Hindu hearts'. It was not until the latter part of the fifteenth century, however, that any influence of Islam is noticed in Hinduism.¹ Here it begins with the great Hindu reformers of north India, Kabīr and Nānak, who in the fifteenth and early sixteenth centuries began a campaign against polytheism, idolatry, and caste. Kabīr (A.D. 1440-1518) himself is thought by some to have been a Muslim, as he undoubtedly bears a Muslim name ; but in any case he became a disciple of the famous teacher Rāmānanda, and ultimately outran his master. In his life, says Dr. J. N. Farquhar :

The two religions mingled. The strongest elements of each laid hold of him and formed his thought. . . . He denounces idolatry as foolish, false and wrong, declares divine incarnation impossible, and laughs at the forms of ascetism as silly practices . . . He was a strict theist calling God Rām, but recognizing no consort, incarnation, or other divine attendant.²

His tomb or shrine is at Maghār, near Gorakhpur, where, in fact, there are two places kept by his devotees—one by a group of Muslims and another by the Hindus !

The influence of Kabīr, who was the earliest teacher to mingle Islam and Hinduism, may be gathered from the number of sects in Hinduism which trace their origin either directly or indirectly to him. Eleven sects, whose present-day followers probably exceed five millions, are given by Dr. Farquhar. They are found scattered everywhere throughout the Hindi-speaking region of northern and central India, as far north-west as the Punjab, and through Bihar down into Bengal. The list, as Dr Farquhar gives it, is as follows :³

¹ An earlier example, however, of an attempted mingling of Islam and Hinduism is to be found in the woman saint of Kashmir, Lāllā-Vakyānī (latter half of the fourteenth century A.D.), many of whose 'wise sayings' are said to be still popular in that country. See S. G. Grierson and L. Barnett, 'Lalla-Vakyani', 1920, Royal Asiatic Society Monographs, XVII.

² J. N. Farquhar, An Outline of the Religious Literature of India, 332 f.

³ Ibid., 334. See next page.

NAME OF SECT	FOUNDER	APPROX. Date, A.D.	CENTRE
1. Kabīrpanthīs ..	Kabīr	1470	Benares
2. Sikhs ..	Nānak	1500	Punjab
3. Dādūpanthīs ..	Dādū	1575	Rajputana
4. Lāl Dāsīs ..	Lāl Dās	1600	Alwar
5. Satnāmīs	1600	Narnol, south of Delhi
6. Bābā Lālīs ..	Bābā Lāl	1625	Dehanpur, near Sirhind
7. Sādhs ..	Birbhan	1658	Near Delhi
8. Charan Dāsīs ..	Charan Dās	1703	Delhi
9. Śiva Narayanīs	Śiva Narayana	1734	Chandrawar, Ghazipur
10. Garīb Dāsīs ..	Gārīb Dās	1740	Chudani, Rohtak
11. Rām Sanehīs ..	Rām Charan	1750	Shahapur, Rajputana

The Kabīrpanthī community, founded by Kabīr, bears but few of the marks of reform which the founder advocated, and, in common with the other sects, has practically reverted to the usual Hindu type.

Nānak (A.D. 1469-1538), who was the founder of the Sikh religion, was also affected to such an extent by the monotheistic principle of Islam and the Hindu revival in his time that he attempted a syncretism or fusion of the two faiths that had come so close in contact. His religious position did not seem to differ greatly from that of Kabīr, at least in the beginning. Ultimately, Hindu ideas and practices crept in, and this, together with the persecution of the Sikhs by Aurangzīb, drove them in religion, as well as association, farther and farther from the Muslims, until to-day they bear few of the traces of Muslim influence, and are regarded as being practically within the pale of Hinduism.

Apart from the Muslim influence found in the life and work of these great Hindu leaders who attempted to form mixed sects, we find others that have arisen from time to time. Some of these are still flourishing, in which a definite mixture of Hindu and Muslim notions and practices prevail, though neither the followers nor their ancestors appear ever to have been converted to Islam. Such attempts in the reconciliation of the two systems go by a variety of names, but they are of no special consequence, either in numbers or influence, and exist rather as interesting curiosities. Among them are the Pirzādas, a sect that had its origin with one Muḥammad Sbāh Dulla about the middle of the seventeenth century. In the book which he compiled he arranged selections for the Hindu and Muslim scriptures, and set up Vishnū in his tenth or nishkalank (sinless) incarnation, which is to come as his supreme deity.¹ The Suthras are a sect in the Punjab in which both Muslims and Hindus are found in fellowship. The Muslim Suthras carry a dandā (staff), with which they strike their iron bracelets (churīs) and keep time to their singing in a most weird fashion. The Chhajjūpanthī sect claims to have been founded by bhagat Chhajjū, of Lahore, in the time of Aurangzīb, and reveals a curious combination of Hindu and Muslim creeds. It prevails only among the lower castes. The Husaynī Brāhmans are Hindus, and are said to derive their name from the fact that they narrate the story of Ḥadrat Imām Ḥusayn. They mark their foreheads with the tīlak, but they beg from Muslims. They have adopted many Muslim beliefs and practices, such as keeping the fast of Ramaḍān, and are special devotees of the shrine of Khawājah Mu‘in-ud-Dīn Chishti, of Ajmīr.² The Shamsīs are a sect which outwardly appears to be Hindu, but actually seems to be affiliated with the Ismā‘īlī Khajahs. It is said to take its name from the great saint of Multan, Pīr Shams-ud-Dīn Tabrizī. Their numbers are confined chiefly to the west of the Jhelum river. They worship no idols, but reverence the Bhagavad Gītā. It is asserted, however, that they hold secret beliefs, and worship the Āghā Khāṇ, whom they regard as an incarnation of the Hindu triad—Brahmā, Vishnū and Śiva.³

Such is the maze of belief that prevails in India. No doubt Islam, with its clear, definite, and simple creed, which stood in contrast to the indigenous vagaries of the imagination and speculation about God, appealed to many Hindus as a satisfying solution of the vexed problem of theology. To others

¹ E.I., II, 491.

² Rose, G.T.C.P., I, 141.

³ Ibid., 402 ; see also Najm-ul-Ghanī Khāṇ, Madhāhib-ul-Islām.

its social democracy granted a welcome release from the bondage of caste. But when all is said, there seems to be little doubt that Hinduism has wrought a far greater change in Islam than Islam has wrought in Hinduism, which still continues to pursue the even tenor of its way with a complacency and confidence that are amazing. For more than twelve long centuries Islam has been in contact with Hinduism in India. It would be strange, indeed, if they had not in one way or another influenced each other.

In fact it is sometimes asserted by Muslims, and not without reason, that the Arya Samaj was formed partly as a result of the contact of Hinduism with Islam. Those who hold this view, point to the reform programme of the Samaj in such matters as widow remarriage and the abolition of caste restrictions of the untouchables.

A further illustration of the social effect of Islam on Hinduism is found among the Kayasthas. This caste is often regarded by orthodox Hindus as half-Muslim, since the members of the group served freely in the Mughul government offices and were greatly influenced in their social activities, dress, religious outlook and education by their Muslim superiors. There are Kayasthas still who dress like Muslims, in their long, flowing achkans and payjamahs, skin-tight to the knee. Some even read the Qur'an, and memorize long passages.

Dr. J. N. Sircar, in a lecture on 'Islam in India', gives the following list of benefits derived by India from the advent of Islam and Muslim rule :

1. Restoration of touch with the outer world, including the revival of an Indian navy and sea-borne trade, both of which had been lost since the decline of the Cholas.
2. Internal peace over a large part of India, especially north of the Vindhya.
3. Uniformity secured by the imposition of the same type of administration.
4. Uniformity of social manners and dress among the upper classes, irrespective of creed.
5. Indo-Saracen art, in which the mediaeval Hindu and Chinese schools were blended together. Also a new style of architecture, and the promotion of industries of a refined variety (e.g. shawl, muslin, and carpet-making, inlaying, etc.).

6. A common lingua franca, called Hindustāni or Rekhta, and an official prose style, mostly the creation of Hindu munshīs writing Persian.
7. Rise of our vernacular literature as the fruits of peace and economic prosperity under the empire of Delhi.
8. Monotheistic religious revival and Šūfism.
9. Historical literature.
10. Improvement in the art of war, and in civilization in general.¹

¹ From The Hindu, Madras, in The Indian Social Reformer, Bombay, March 31, 1928.

CHAPTER IX

MODERN MOVEMENTS : REACTIONARY AND PROGRESSIVE

INDIAN Islam has provided abundant incentive to reformers in the last century in two directions. The widespread saint worship, and the masses whose imperfect conversion to Islam left them in possession of customs and beliefs that were far more Hindu than Muslim, led certain ardent souls to inaugurate a puritanical reform, not unlike that carried on by the followers of Muḥammad 'Abd-ul-Wahhāb in Arabia. While the latter movement began with the opening of the nineteenth century, and was wholly reactionary in character, yet it persists even to the present time, and not without beneficial results to the Muslim community. More than fifty years later a reform movement of a wholly different nature was inaugurated, being definitely progressive and modern. Strange to say, the chief characters in each movement bore the name Sayyid Aḥmad. But the one was a violent individual, who pronounced India Dār-ul-Harb, declared war on the infidels, and took for his slogan, 'Back to the original Islam'; while the other was a peaceful, loyal British subject, who declared India to be Dār-ul-Islām, and sought to justify his progressive policies to his orthodox critics by asserting that he was interpreting the spirit of the real Islam. Each desired to rest his case on the Prophet, the Qur'ān, and Traditions; each sought to sweep away the theological and legal incrustations of the intervening centuries that had covered the true Faith: but there they parted, and moved in completely opposite directions. The one had no use for modernism: Muslims must go back to the original purity of Islam. The other would employ 'Reason' to adapt Islam to modern conditions. We shall now consider these two developments, which may be broadly designated as the Wahhābī Movement; and the Aligarh Movement, whose influence has been India-wide.

THE WAHHĀBĪ MOVEMENT

The puritanical sect, founded in Arabia during the eighteenth century by Muḥammad 'Abd-ul-Wahhāb, was destined to have far-reaching influences throughout the Muslim world, and nowhere outside the land of its birth has that influence been more pronounced than in India. Although the sect as such has never been formally organized in India under the name 'Wahhābī', yet the doctrines professed by certain of the Indian reformers have been of that school, and the popular tendency has been to describe their activities as the 'Wahhābī Movement'.

In general, the movement has been marked by renewed emphasis of tawḥīd (the unity of God); adherence to the principle of ijtihād, or the right of the individual to interpret the Qur'ān and the Hadīth (Traditions), and rejection of the four orthodox schools of canon law; opposition to the worship of saints, which they hold to be a form of polytheism (shirk); and earnest endeavour to remove all traces of the practices of early faiths from the worship of Hindu converts to Islam. In this movement there was a 'right' and a 'left' wing. The former was led by Sharī'at Allāh and Karāmat 'Alī, attempting nothing beyond definite efforts to root out undesirable practices belonging to the earlier faiths, and working peacefully for the purification of Islam in India. The left wing, led by Sayyid Aḥmad, of Rae Bareilly, even went so far as to declare a holy war (jihād).

The first appearance of Wahhābī ideas in India was about the year 1804, when the Farā'idī sect was founded in eastern Bengal by Ḥājī Sharī'at Allāh. The account of his life and work, as given by M. Hidayet Hosain,¹ states that he was born of obscure parents in the village of Bahādurpūr, in the district of Farīdpūr, Bengal, and when eighteen years of age he went on a pilgrimage to Mecca. Here he stayed for twenty years as a disciple of Shaykh Ṭāhir as-Sunbul al-Makkī, who at that time was the head of the Shāfi'ī sect at Mecca. On returning to India, about 1802, he began quietly to promulgate his newly-framed doctrines in the villages of his native district. Although he encountered much opposition and abuse, he succeeded in gathering around him a body of devoted followers, and little by little came to be regarded as a holy man.

¹ The Encyclopaedia of Islam, II, 57 ff.

His major emphasis was the assertion that India under non-Muslim rule was Dār-ul-Harb, and, therefore, it was not lawful to observe Friday prayers or the two great festivals, 'Īd-ul-Fiṭr and 'Īd-ul-Aḍḥā. He also discontinued the use of the term pīr (priest) and murīd (disciple), and substituted in their place the titles ustād (teacher) and shāgird (pupil), because they did not imply complete submission of the pupil to the religious preceptor, as the other terms did. For the same reason he prohibited the ceremony of joining hands, which was customary at the initiation of a disciple, but instead he required from every one of his disciples repentance (tawbah) for past sins, and declaration of intention to lead a more righteous and godly life in the future.

The extent of the influence of the work of this remarkable character is further described by M. Hidayet Hosain as follows :

That he came of obscure parentage amid the swamps of eastern Bengal, and should be the first preacher to denounce the superstitions and corrupt beliefs, which long contact with Hindu polytheism had developed, is remarkable enough ; but that the apathetic and careless Bengali peasant should be roused into enthusiasm is still more so. To effect this required a sincere and sympathetic preacher ; and no one ever appealed more strongly to the sympathies of a people than Sharī'at Allāh, whose blameless and exemplary life was admired by his countrymen, who venerated him as a father able to advise them in times of adversity, and give consolation in cases of affliction.¹

The sect was further developed by the son of the founder, Dūdḥū Miyān, who was born in 1819. Early in his career he made the pilgrimage to Mecca, and on his return devoted his time and talents to the spread of his father's doctrines, besides adding some new ones of his own. Among other things, we are told that he insisted upon his disciples eating the common grasshopper (phanga), which they detested, because the locust (tiḍḍī) was used as food in Arabia ! He had a genius for organization, and, making his headquarters at Bahādurpūr, he divided eastern Bengal into circles (ḥalqah), appointing a deputy, or khalīfah, over each to collect contributions from the members for furthering the ends of the central association. He also established an espionage system, and used his agents to secure information throughout their areas for the purpose of protecting members of the sect against landlords. He even tried to make all Muḥammadan peasants join his sect, 'and on refusal caused them to be beaten and excommunicated from the society of the faithful, and destroyed their crops'. His success was won chiefly among the cultivators and village workmen, because he took up the cudgels on their behalf. 'He asserted the equality of mankind, and taught that the welfare of the lowly and poor was as much an object of interest as that of the high and rich. When a brother fell into distress it was, he taught, the duty of his neighbours to assist him, and nothing, he affirmed, was criminal, or unjustifiable, which might be used to that end. He also taught that there was no sin in persecuting those who refused to embrace his doctrines, or who appealed to government courts against the orders of the society and its acknowledged leaders.'¹

¹ Ibid.

The sect as such seems to be slowly dying out; but its chief doctrines of reform still live in what is known as the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth sect, which has served in these later times as the organization into which most of the reforming tendencies of the early so-called 'Wahhābī reformers' of India have been absorbed.

THE ṬARĪQAH-I-MUḤAMMADĪYAH SECT

Of the various attempts at reform in Indian Islam during the early part of the nineteenth century, none was prosecuted more vigorously or over a wider area than that sponsored by Sayyid Aḥmad, of Rae Bareli. This adventurous spirit was born in the year 1782, and spent a considerable portion of his young manhood as a freebooter and outlaw. Later, however, he abandoned this sort of life, and about 1816 became a religious disciple of the pious and learned Shāh 'Abd-ul-'Azīz, of Delhi, where his spiritual gifts were soon recognized. He became a noted preacher, and, after three years discipleship, went forth to preach against the abuses that had crept into the faith and practice of the Indian Muslims. The first work he attempted was among the Rohillas of north India, where he soon 'obtained a zealous and turbulent following'.¹ Encouraged by this success, he pressed forward, and, according to W. W. Hunter, his advance assumed the character of a triumphal procession as he journeyed slowly southwards during the year 1820. His disciples rendered him menial service in acknowledgement of his spiritual dignity, and men of rank and learning ran like common servants, with their shoes off, by the side of the palanquin.²

¹ Ibid.

After he reached Patna, in Bihar, where he stayed for a considerable time, the number of his followers became so increased that a regular system of government had to be devised.

He appointed agents to go forth and collect a tax from the profits of trade in all the large towns which had lain on his route. He further nominated four khālīfas, or spiritual vice-regents, and a high priest, by a formal deed, such as the Muḥammadan emperors used in appointing governors of provinces. Having thus formed a permanent centre at Patna, he proceeded towards Calcutta, following the course of the Ganges, making converts and appointing agents in every important town by the way. In Calcutta the masses flocked to him in such numbers that he was unable to go through the ceremony of initiation by the separate laying on of hands. Unrolling his turban, therefore, he declared that all who could touch any part of its ample length became his disciples.³

Elated with his remarkable success, he started on a pilgrimage to Mecca from Calcutta in the year 1822. After his travels through Arabia and Syria, where he undoubtedly came into contact with the Wahhābī reformers, he returned to India, more disgusted than ever with the abuses and degradation of Islam which had grown up largely from contact with Hinduism. So, inspired by what he saw in other lands, he began to preach with renewed vigour, centering his attack on these abuses, seeking to free Islam from Hindu corruptions. He also preached the necessity of a holy war (jihād), because India, under the domination of a non-Muslim power, was no longer Dār-ul-Islām, but Dār-ul-Harb. In less than two years the majority of respectable Muslims had adopted his ideas.¹

¹ W. W. Hunter, The Indian Musalmans, 12.

² Ibid., 13.

³ Ibid., 13.

From that time the Muslims of India began to be divided into two camps, and the effects of that division have not passed away even yet ; for the principles of Wāhhābism, which were taught by Sayyid Aḥmad and his associate preachers, were too fundamental, and too closely related to the freedom of the spirit, to die. The party of the reformers did not, however, find its path strewn with roses all the way. There were many adversaries. Sayyid Aḥmad called his sect the Tarīqah-i-Muḥammadiyah (The Way of Muhammad), which had a strong 'Back to Muḥammad' emphasis in it ; but the opponents of the sect, the orthodox maulvīs and others, spoke of them derisively as 'Wāhhābīs'. On the other hand, Sayyid Aḥmad and his followers retaliated by calling all who did not accept the principles of reform, 'Mushrik' (Polytheists) !

Sayyid Aḥmad, however, was not to lead his movement for long. Carried to excessive lengths by his zeal for prosecuting a holy war against the Sikhs, he finally met his end in an engagement on the frontier near Peshawar, in the year 1831 ; and his hosts, without their leader, were speedily dispersed. The 'warlike ramifications' of this Wāhhābī leader were indeed of no small character, and were not confined to the Punjab and Bengal. In fact, writes Hunter :

It seemed as if a Fanatic Confederacy had firmly established itself in the heart of southern India. . . . The Wāhhābī organization included a brother of the Nizām, who was to have been raised to the Hyderabad throne ; and, had the plan not broken down the leaders would have had a great store of newly-cast cannon and munitions of all sorts, with a formidable body of adherents, both among the semi-independent native chiefs, and in the military courts of the south.²

With the passing of the great leader it seemed for a time as though the end of the organization of which he was the centre and inspiration had come. Three things, however, made it possible to carry his work forward. It must be noted first that while the reformers had been forced to give up the prosecution of a holy war as an impracticable part of their programme, for the time being, yet effort was made to keep the smouldering embers of hatred for the infidel rule alive, so that when the time should be ripe, another, and perchance a more successful, effort might be made. Secondly, the desire for the purification and reform of Islam seemed to have taken hold of the preachers of the movement, with a consuming passion. Thirdly, credit must be given to the keen foresight of Sayyid Ahmad in establishing an organization that could carry on effectively after his death. These three things, then—a passion for the freedom of Islam, a passion for the reform of Islam, and a wellnigh perfect organization for propaganda—saved the day for the Wahhābīs, and, as Hunter says :

¹ Garcin De Tassy, Histoire de la littérature hindoue et hindoustanie, III, 33.

² Hunter, op. cit., 42.

The missionary zeal of the Patna khalifahs, and the immense pecuniary resources at their command, once more raised the sacred banner from the dust. They covered India with their emissaries, and brought about one of the greatest religious revivals that has ever taken place. The two khalifahs themselves went through Bengal and southern India. The minor missionaries were innumerable, and a skilful organization enabled them to settle in any place where the multitude of converts made it worth their while. In this way almost every one of the fanatic districts had its permanent preacher, whose zeal was sharpened from time to time by visits of the itinerant missionaries, and whose influence was consolidated and rendered permanent by the Central Propaganda at Patna. . . . Everywhere they stirred the Muhammadan population to its depths.¹

THE THEOLOGICAL IMPLICATIONS OF THE MOVEMENT

The intense zeal and remarkable success that attended the preaching of Sayyid Ahmad indicate an unusual personality. Combined with this strong personal force were other elements that contributed not a little to the interest that was aroused. He was lineally descended from the Prophet Muhammad himself. He was subject to trances, or fits of ecstasy, 'during which he communed with God and the Apostles. In dreams, the beloved daughter of Muhammad and her husband (his lineal ancestors) visited him, saluted him as their son, bathed him in sweet essences, and arrayed him in royal apparel.' Furthermore, his disciples saw in his 'grave, taciturn and gentle demeanour; even in his person' much that reminded them of their Prophet, and attracted them to him.²

¹ Ibid., 49 ff.

² Ibid.

But that was not all. Behind this strong personality lay the ancient popular belief in the coming of the promised 'Imām Mahdī',¹ who was to come and lead the faithful in a last great crusade against the Anti-Christ, who should rise in the last days. His disciples not only grew to believe that he was the promised Imām Mahdī, but so insistent were they that he himself finally yielded to their arguments, and assumed all the titles, dignities, and authority appertaining to such a distinguished personage. To a certain extent, therefore, this movement had much in common with the Mahdawī movements already considered.

Having settled the question of the divine mission of the leader, it became necessary to promulgate other more general and less personal doctrines, which should sustain the movement. He found these in asserting that God alone must be worshipped without the 'interposition of humanly devised forms and ceremonies'. From this position he developed his entire body of teaching, which he and his disciples have elaborated in an extensive literature.

In the Şirāt-ul-Mustaqīm,² which contains the views of the Sayyid as they were set down by his disciple, Hājī Muḥammad Ismā'il, of Delhi, we read that :

The law of the Prophet is founded on two things : First, the not attributing to any creature the attribute of God ; and second, not inventing forms and practices which were not invented in the days of the Prophet, and his successors, the Khalīfahs. The first consists in disbelieving that angels, spirits, spiritual guides, disciples, teachers, students, prophets or saints remove one's difficulties. In abstaining from having recourse to any of the above creations for the attainment of any wish or desire. In denying that any of them has the power of granting favour or removing evils ; in considering them as helpless and ignorant as one's self in respect of the power of God. In never making any offering to any prophet, saint, holy man, or angel, for the obtaining of any object, but merely to consider them as friends of God. To believe that they have power to rule the accidents of life, and that they are acquainted with the sacred knowledge of God, is downright infidelity.

With regard to the second point, true and undefiled religion consists in strongly adhering to all the devotions and practices in the affairs of life which were observed by the Prophet. In avoiding all such innovations as marriage ceremonies, mourning ceremonies, adorning of tombs, erection of large edifices over graves, lavish expenditure on the anniversaries of the dead, street processions, and the like, and in endeavouring as far as may be practicable to put a stop to these practices.¹

¹ See pp. 106 ff.

² This book is in Urdū, and is obtainable in the ordinary bazaar.

This whole programme, as outlined above, was a direct attempt to secure the reform of practices which had long been a part of the regular Islamic life of the country. But to urge their discontinuance was to immediately divide the Muslims into two camps. Still, there can be no denying that Indian Islam needed, and still needs, reform exactly at the spots where the Sayyid attacked it so vigorously a century and a half ago. That he attained as much success as he did speaks well for the spirit of earnestness latent in the religious life of Indian Muslims, without which no progress whatever can be made. In fact, it is this part of his propaganda that has lasted the longest. Reform of Muslim practices is a serious matter ; and as it then engaged the attention of some of the best minds of Muslim India, so it still forms a matter of earnest concern for those advanced leaders of Muslim thought who would like to see Islam purged of all the hurtful, degrading, and un-Islamic practices that keep it from being fashioned on more rational and progressive lines.

Since these reforming doctrines went right to the heart of the everyday life of Muslims in the villages of India, the approach of a 'Wahhābī' preacher was as likely to create a storm as to produce a following. That a storm not unfrequently broke is indicated by the following incident, related by Hunter, which occurred in one of the villages of western Bengal. A reformer had come to the village and had delivered himself of the new doctrines, and as the group broke up at the close of the harangue, public opinion, though divided, was mainly against the preacher. One said : ' This man would have us let the lamp go out at the tomb of our father.' Another : ' He forbids the drums and dancing girls at the marriage of our daughters.' A third was more favourable ; . . . but a Mullā ended the discussion. ' This fellow ', he said, ' is a follower of the false Imām who took the holy cities by the sword, closed up the path of pilgrimage, and wrote on the door of the pure house, There is no God but God, and Saud is His Prophet.'

¹ W. W. Hunter, The Indian Musalmans, 54.

THE PEACEFUL REFORMS OF KARĀMAT 'ALĪ

The reform propaganda initiated by Sayyid Aḥmad was still further developed by Maulvī Karāmat 'Alī, whose work largely paved the way for the establishment of the organization which has more recently developed under the name of Ahl-i-Hadīth. Karāmat 'Alī was born at Jaunpur, U.P., in the early part of the nineteenth century. Some time between the years 1820 and 1824, during one of the tours of Sayyid Aḥmad in northern India, Karāmat 'Alī became one of the most ardent and devoted of his younger disciples. However, as A. Yūsuf 'Alī remarks, 'He does not appear to have taken part in the jihād which Sayyid Aḥmad waged against the Sikhs, or to have ever been in the Afghān borderland, where Sayyid Aḥmad was slain in battle in 1831'.¹

In fact, he not only identified himself with the peaceful propaganda for the reform of Islam in Bihar and Bengal, but he even seems to have refused to go to extremes in many matters advocated by the reformers. He was, after all, very moderate in his ideas, for he gave himself with unreserved zeal to the double task of combating the Hindu customs and superstitions which had crept into the practice of Islam in eastern Bengal, and of trying to bring back into the fold of orthodoxy the new heterodox schools, which had grown up as a result of the work of Shari'at Allāh and his son Dūdhū Miyān. In some particulars he was far separated from the reform principles of Sayyid Aḥmad, for he boldly accepted the doctrine of 'spiritual preceptorship' (pīrimurīdī), which the former vigorously denounced, and even went so far as to write tracts against Shari'at Allāh, Dūdhū Miyān, and the Wahhābīs. He was thus only an orthodox reformer, who adhered to the tradition that in every century a teacher is born to renew the faith. He regarded Sayyid Aḥmad as such a renewer (mujaddid) for the thirteenth century of the Hegira, and held that he should be followed until another renewer arise for the fourteenth.²

Karāmat 'Alī exhibited remarkable power for the regeneration of Islam all his life, so that at the time of his death, in

¹ E.I., II, 752.

² Ibid., 753.

1873, there was scarcely a village in Bengal that did not contain some of his disciples. His work has been carried on by his son, Maulvī Ḥāfiẓ Aḥmad, who died in 1898, and by his nephew, Muḥammad Muhsin ; and there are certain districts of the province where his influence is still a living force.

THE AHL-I-ḤADĪTH

The influence of the so-called Wahhābī Movement still continues in two directions : one is in the organizations that it has left behind and the other in the effects on the development of the larger orthodox group. Traces of the original community left by Sayyid Aḥmad are still to be found on the North-West Frontier, as are also similar traces of the schools of Shari‘at Allāh and Karāmat ‘Alī found in Bengal ; but the most vigorous line of descent goes by the name of the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth (People of Tradition). While the numbers of this sect are not extremely numerous, yet it received regular mention in the Census of India. It has an organization known as the ‘All-India Ahl-i-Ḥadīth Conference’, which holds annual sessions ; while district organizations are found in a large part of India, particularly the Punjab, north India, Bihar, and Bengal. Religious journals, books, and tracts are published ; theological schools (madrasahs) for the training of preachers are maintained, and separate mosques are built.

The leaders of the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth sect declare that it is in no way related to the founder of the Wahhābī Movement of Arabia ; but, however vigorously they may deny any connexion, the spirit and the aims of this group appear to be identical with those of the Najdī reformer. Their creed and aim are concisely stated thus : ‘Whatever the Prophet Muḥammad taught in the Qur‘ān and the authoritative Traditions (Aḥādīth Saḥīḥ), that alone is the basis of the religion known as the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth.’¹ The tenets of the sect give clear expression to the zeal which seeks to go back to first principles and to restore the original simplicity and sincerity of faith and practice. Emphasis is put upon the following :

¹ Maulana Abū‘l-Wafā Ṭhanā Allāh, Risālah Ahl-i-Ḥadīth ka Madhhab, 82, 83.

1. The reassertion of the unity (tawhīd) of Allāh, and a denial of occult powers, and knowledge of the hidden things ('ilm-ul-ghayb) to any of his creatures. This is a direct attack on the belief in saints, which has been so commonly adopted.

2. The rejection of the four recognized schools of canon law, and the assertion that the Qur'ān and Traditions, as accepted by the Companions of the Prophet, are the only worthy guide for true Muslims. By thus casting aside the legal opinions, decisions, and judgments of the four orthodox schools of law, they reject the common notion that ijtihād (legal conclusions) of the founders of these four schools are of final authority, and rather contend that every believer is free to follow his own interpretations of the Qur'ān and the Traditions, provided he has sufficient learning to enable him to give a valid interpretation. Consequently, they do not accept the ijmā' (agreement) of the people of Islam as final, but are inclined to the view that it is incumbent on the learned people of each succeeding age to seek for their generation their own interpretation of the Qur'ān and Traditions, rather than to rely on taqlīd (blind acceptance) of the teaching and imitation of predecessors. This is a far-reaching principle, and the application and spirit of it have gone far beyond the confines of the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth organization in influencing reform.

3. As a corollary to the preceding positions, every effort is made to eradicate customs that may be traced either to innovation or to Hindu or other un-Islamic origin. India is a land where formal adherence to the Qur'ān and precepts of Islam sits lightly upon the masses, the real religious life being overlaid with practices and beliefs that belong to a contrary system. In the address of the chairman of the All-India Ahl-i-Ḥadīth Conference, held in Gujranwala, in the Punjab, in 1924, we are given a vivid picture of the need for this work. This gentleman wrote as follows : ' Up to sixty years ago in this district and city the name of Ahl-i-Ḥadīth was not known to anyone. Polytheism, innovations, and the customs of the infidels were so common among Muslims that it was impossible to distinguish them from non-Muslims, except in the very special matters of religious observance. Islamic duties were performed, but in a wholly perfunctory manner, and very little attention indeed was paid to their inner truth and meaning.’¹ To correct this situation the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth earnestly laboured and thus proves itself the spiritual offspring of ‘Abd-ul-Wahhāb, Sharī‘at Allāh, Sayyid Aḥmad, and Karāmat ‘Alī.

THE AHL-I-QUR’ĀN

The spirit of reform that gave birth to the Ahl-i-Ḥadīth was productive of still another sect, known as the Ahl-i-Qur’ān, founded in 1902, which rejects not only all traditional theology, and all the legal requirements of the four schools of canon law, but even the ijmā‘ (agreement) of the Companions of the Prophet, as expressed in the authoritative Traditions, and insists that the Qur’ān alone is sufficient for guidance. The founder of this sect was Maulvī ‘Abd Allāh Chakrālāwī, who had his headquarters in Lahore. He preached and wrote with great zeal during the early part of the present century, and, in addition to preparing a special form of creed and pledge to be signed by his followers (‘Ahdnāmah-i-Aqā’id-i-Ahl-i-Dhikr wa al-Qur’ān), prepared also a special prayer ritual for their use. He likewise had his own mosque for the adherents of his sect. Although this new group does not seem to have attained to any great importance or influence outside the Punjab, and the numbers seem to be on the decrease, yet it still continues to defend its position, and issues a monthly magazine, called the Ishā‘at-ul-Qur’ān.

In addition to the above peculiarities are the following : They consider the call to prayer (adhān) unnecessary ; the tabkīr (repetition of the phrase ‘God is great’) is not said aloud ; in prayer only the obligatory (fard) portions are binding, while the sunnah (traditional) and nafl (optional) rak‘āts (sections of ritual prayer) are rejected altogether. While other Muḥammadans bend both knees in prayer, the Ahl-i-Qur’ān kneel on one knee only. Funeral and ‘Id prayers are considered unnecessary, and they assert that offering of prayers and alms for the dead are of no avail.

¹ Translated from the Khuṭbah-i-Ṣadārat (presidential address), published by the All-India Ahl-i-Ḥadīth Conference.

REFORMS UNDER THE INFLUENCES OF WESTERN CIVILIZATION

During the first eleven centuries of the history of Islam in India (A.D. 711-1800) the influence of Muslim states and centres of learning had been paramount. As we have seen, there was a constant and varied stream of immigrants moving towards India, from the time of Maḥmūd of Ghaznī: Arabs, Persians, Afghāns, Turks, and Mongols. They were recruits for the armies and government posts; poets and artists from Persia; saints, preachers, and men of learning; merchants and adventurers. All these, coming with new life and fresh vigour, acted as a tremendous force for the continual regeneration and reinforcement of the constantly growing indigenous Muslim population, and served not only as a reminder of the dependence of Indian Islam upon the older countries of the Faith towards the west, but also became the models and examples after which the Muslims of India sought to pattern their lives and culture. At the beginning Arabic was the language of Indian Muslims, but this gave way to Persian, which was the dominant court and literary language for more than eight centuries.

Beginning, however, with the early part of the nineteenth century, marked changes set in. For more than a hundred years, after the death of Aurangzib, the last of the powerful Mughuls, disintegration had been going on, not only in Muslim political power, but in Muslim life and culture as well, owing to the lack of a strong central government and leadership. Furthermore, the influence of western civilization, which was slowly but surely creeping closer and closer to Muslim India, was destined to invade the innermost precincts of its life, and begin a radical transformation. This close contact of Indian Islam with the west began with the commercial and political ascendancy which Britain gained over the Indian peninsula, and which in 1857 removed the last vestige of Mughul imperial authority. For many years before this date, and continuously since, the influence of western civilization has been the dominant factor in moulding the development of Islam in India and Pakistan, no escape from it being possible.

IMMEDIATE EFFECTS OF BRITISH OCCUPATION

The effects of British occupation, and the consolidation of political authority which followed the complete disintegration and overthrow of Muslim power, soon became apparent. Muslims were withdrawn from government positions which it had been their privilege to enjoy for centuries under the patronage of their own rulers. Persian as the official language was discarded in 1837, and English and the vernaculars of India put in its place. From that date, in every school and court, this change of language served as a constant reminder to the Muslim of the distinct loss that had come to his community, and of the fact that he was now among the subject peoples of mankind. It is true that in the distinctly 'Muslimized' sections of the country, such as the United Provinces and the Punjab, the newly-developed Indian Muslim language, Urdū, was accepted rather than Hindi as the vernacular preferred in the courts. But this offered little consolation to the wounded feelings of Muslims in the early days, though at the present time it has come to be one of the elements of Muslim culture in India and Pakistan that is most dearly prized by the community. Another effect of British control which wounded the susceptibilities of Muslims was the abolition of the government posts of Quāḍī and Quāḍī-ul-Quḍāt, and the consequent effect upon the administration of Muslim law. All of this secularization of the life of Muslims by a non-Muslim power came to be viewed with great apprehension, with consequences of the most reactionary character.

The first result to be noted was a feeling of 'sullen discontent', which spread over the Muslim community, and even before all of the above changes had taken place Sharī'at Allāh and Sayyid Aḥmad, of Rae Barli, in the spirit of the Arabian Wahhābīs, had begun to raise the question whether India was any longer a suitable place of residence for Muslims. Thus a discussion was started in the Muslim community which lasted for half a century, as to whether India was Dār-ul-Harb or Dār-ul-Islām. Some of the more zealous elements, as we have seen, under the leadership of Sayyid Aḥmad, actually did declare a holy war, preached the necessity of emigration (hijrat) to lands under Muslim rule, and carried their agitation all over India. In fact, it is believed that the Mutiny of 1857 was partly due, at least, to a recrudescence of this spirit, which sought to re-establish the Mughul power, but which resulted rather in the ruin of many old Muslim families, whose estates were confiscated because of complicity in the rebellion.

Along with the processes of direct action which were aimed at the overthrow of alien domination and the re-establishment of Muslim power in all its ancient glory and influence with truly religious significance for the protection of Islam, there arose an effective conspiracy on the part of Muslims everywhere. Led by their conservative maulvis, they determined to boycott the western institutions which were rapidly taking root and flourishing everywhere. This prohibition had a particular reference to western education, which included the teaching of English and modern science in the Government and Mission schools, everywhere springing up. With vehement language the reactionary maulvis inveighed against the institutions of the infidels. The faithful were warned that the end of such education was sure and certain infidelity, and that those who attended such schools, or permitted their sons to do so, would be accounted apostates. Even life itself was threatened in order to prevent the introduction of such a serious innovation, with all its implications for the religion of Islam, as viewed by the conservatives. The result of this attitude on the part of the learned leaders of the community was that for many decades Muslims in India fell farther and farther behind their Hindu compatriots in the matter of education; for the latter were not at all slow to avail themselves of the new educational facilities, and to adapt themselves to changing circumstances and the requirements of the new Government. With a stubborn but fruitless resistance, the Muslim community pursued its disastrous policy of isolation and self-sufficiency, until well past the middle of the nineteenth century, when there arose that daring apostle of reform and reconciliation, Sir Syed Ahmad Khān, whose name will ever be associated with all that is progressive and forward-looking in the annals of Islam in India and Pakistan.

THE DAWN OF A NEW DAY

With Sir Syed we arrive at the dawn of a new day, the beginning of a new era. No other figure in Indian Islam deserves such reverent consideration and respect as this sturdy pioneer and beloved leader, who, through endless opposition, but with dauntless courage and faith, blazed a new trail for succeeding generations of his Muslim brethren to follow.

Syed Ahmad Khān (1817-1898), born of a noble Delhi family, received the usual orthodox education, and qualified for a subordinate government post. He early came to realize the value of the newly-established government for the country, but at the same time saw with painful clarity the hopelessness of the conservative attitude of his community toward the modern way of life. Then, circumstances suddenly changed. The Mutiny of 1857 burst with all its fury of racial and religious hate upon his country. Today, this outburst of violence against the foreign rulers is sometimes referred to as India's first struggle for independence. But during this reign of terror, with which his own people were chiefly associated, he remained loyal to the established rule, as did many other Muslims in those difficult days, in spite of injured pride. However, he became increasingly certain that his community could be rescued from their condition of ruin and utter despair only by adopting a wholly new attitude toward the revolutionizing influences from the West. On the one hand he sought to win the sympathy of the ruling power toward his people by declaring that they were essentially loyal to the British Government.¹ At the same time he diligently set about seeking to convert his community to the new attitude which he was convinced would alone save it from complete destruction.

First, he insisted that there must be a change of political outlook. Instead of regarding India under British rule as Dār-ul-Harb, he insisted that, even though it was not under Muslim rule, it was to be regarded as Dār-ul-Islām, because Muslims were perfectly free to exercise all the essential rites and ceremonies of their religion.

¹ A pamphlet entitled The Causes of the Indian Mutiny.

Secondly, he declared that there must be a change in the religious outlook. He considered that Muslims were suffering from the effects of a religious and theological straight-jacket, which had been imposed on them by well-meaning but irrational custom. While he guarded, as jealously as any the prophetic office of Muḥammad, the Qur'ān as the final revelation of God, and well-attested Tradition as the 'pillars of the faith', he insisted that the individual should assert his natural right to interpret these matters for himself in the light of reason. Religion rests on a natural basis and must conform to the laws of Nature, not on the deductions of man. At this point he took issue with conservatives, who insist on blind acceptance and observance (taqlid) of the religious ordinances as handed down from ancient religious authorities, for he wrote, 'I hope every lover of truth will candidly and impartially investigate the truth of Islam, and make a just and accurate distinction between its real principles and those which have been laid down for the perpetual and firm maintenance and observance of the same, as well as between those that are solely the productions of those persons whom we designate as learned men, divines, doctors, and lawyers'.¹

While he was endeavouring to create a new spirit of inquiry among his people, and set up for them a new norm of interpretation of Islam through rationalizing processes of investigation, at the same time he was led to make a study of Christianity. This led to an effort on his part to try to reconcile the two religions. He pleaded for more sympathy from both sides. He asserted that he believed that the gospel writers were inspired, that the Christians and Jews did not corrupt their scriptures, and that the books spoken of in the holy Qur'ān were the same books as exist to-day among Jews and Christians.² In furtherance of his desire to bring about a better understanding between Christians and Muslims, he attempted to bring out a Mohammedan Commentary on the Holy Bible, the first volume of which was published in 1862 at Ghazipur, and the second volume at Aligarh in 1865. As one turns the pages of these two volumes, one is struck with the daring purpose of the author, and is not surprised that the second volume is finished without getting any further than the close of the eleventh chapter of Genesis. The marvel is that he had the courage to make the attempt at all ! The method, too, is unique. Most of the space is taken up with essays about religion in general and Islam in particular, but when the commentary does begin he places the Hebrew text, with interlinear translation in Urdū, followed by the English version just below, and in a parallel column on the same page are placed corresponding portions of the Qur'ān and the Traditions in Arabic, with similar translations, all of which is followed by elaborate notes.

¹ Syed Aḥmad Khān, Essays on the Life of Mohammed, I, xi.

² Syed Aḥmad Khān, The Mohammedan Commentary on the Holy Bible, I, 23.

Thirdly, he stated that there must be a change in the method and purpose of education. He held that the old ideas of education were wholly inadequate ; that modern science and oriental learning were not mutually exclusive, and that Muslims must make an effort to combine them. He held that, since the world of Nature about us, which is God's work, and Revelation, which is His word, both proceed from the same source, there can be no ultimate conflict between Science and Religion. He insisted that it was only as his community came to know and share the benefits of western science that they could also truly come to understand and appreciate their own religion.

Fourthly, he laid emphasis on the need for social reform, and carried on a vigorous and fearless campaign in its behalf, particularly through his magazine, Tahdhib-ul-Akhlāq (Reform of Morals). He especially challenged the ideas that inter-dining with Christians was unlawful, that the pardah was a necessity for women, and that it was not necessary to educate them.

However, Sir Syed was not alone in the task of bringing about the New Day for Muslims in India. He was fortunate in finding likeminded associates who contributed to his success. Even before the Mutiny of 1857, in both Calcutta and Delhi there were specific instances of growing liberal tendencies in the Muslim community. Calcutta took the lead in this respect, for in 1863 the Muhammadan Literary Society was started by Nawāb 'Abd-ul-Latif, who became its secretary. One of the main objectives of this Society was to emphasize the increasing importance of western learning and culture. The first step was to introduce the study of the English language and literature, which was made a part of the curriculum in the Hastings' Calcutta Madrasa. Although there was, in the beginning, opposition to be faced, there also gradually developed increasing strength and enthusiasm for the new educational programme envisioned by Nawāb Abd-ul-Latif and Sir Syed Ahmad Khān.

To implement some of the new ideas and progressive plans which Sir Syed cherished, it is interesting to note some of the practical steps which he took. In 1861 he personally established an English school at Moradabad, and another in Ghazipur in 1864. It was while he was in Ghazipur, also, that he developed the idea of establishing a Literary and Scientific Society to bring the East and West into closer contact for the benefit of his own people. His plan was to translate standard English works into Urdu, so that Muslims who had refused association with English education might absorb some of the thought and culture of the West. For this purpose, also, he supported the steps that were taken to establish in 1866 the British Indian Association, which was intended to help bridge the gulf between India and the West.

With this end in view, in 1869-70 he paid a visit to England where he spent much time studying the great universities of Oxford and Cambridge, as well as the educational system and facilities of the country as a whole. He was so impressed with what he saw that on his return to India he determined to establish an institution which should embody his advanced ideas. His heart was set on it, come what may. His proposal met with equally determined opposition from his conservative Muslim community. He was denounced, and execrated, and even his life was threatened. Still he stuck to his one high purpose. Finally, through the aid of friends and kindred spirits, whom he had won as supporters for his cause the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College was opened at Aligarh on the 24th of May, 1875.

In December, 1922 the College formally became a Central University after the enactment of the Aligarh Muslim University Act in that year. It is a residential and teaching University, and as of 1956, has the President of the Indian Union as its Rector, Nawab Syed Raza Ali of Rampur as its Chancellor, Nawab Muhammad Ahmad Said Khan of Chhatari as its Pro-Chancellor, and Dr. Zakir Husain as its Vice-Chancellor. Scholarships are provided for deserving students. The Library has about 40,000 volumes in the General and 17,000 in the Oriental Section, including some 4,000 Manuscripts. The students publish their own University Magazine, at the University Press. The most important Association is the Muslim University Union, which follows the pattern of the Oxford and Cambridge University Unions. It is the chief centre of social and intellectual life of the students.

In spite of these modern developments, the institution still retains the impress of its founder. The Department of Religion had for its first 'Dean' one of the original appointees of Sir Syed himself. Today, among the departments of study is included the Faculty of Theology, which offers two courses, the ordinary and the advanced course. A degree of Bachelor of Theology is awarded on completion of the courses. It is safe to say that, in spite of all that the reactionary maulvis thought of him, Sir Syed never considered himself as anything but a man of genuinely Muslim outlook, determined to keep Islam in India in step with the changing times. One of his chief passions was that the young men who passed through his institution should have a vital knowledge and appreciation of their faith, but without that bigotry and fanaticism which he found so frequently associated with the training which was narrowly Islamic in character.

How far the community has advanced in following the lead he gave may be judged from the fact that today special attention is paid to the education of women, who are admitted to the B.A., the M.A. and the Bachelor of Teaching classes of the University. However, the teaching arrangements for the B.A. classes are made in the Women's College, while arrangements have been made for the M.A. and B.T. students to attend classes in the University and the Training College respectively, along with the men students, under proper purdah arrangements. Also it should be noted that the highly cultured and refined wives of many of the professors enjoy social functions in the company of their husbands with as much ease and grace as any of their European sisters.

From the beginning, Sir Syed Ahmad had a vision of an Indian Muslim Oxford, which should train young men of character and capacity in all that is best in Oriental and Occidental learning. He wisely sought to lay the foundation of this education on a religious basis for the building of sound character. Today the work of Sir Syed Aḥmad in Aligarh ranks as one of the outstanding pioneering achievements in the realm of Modern Muslim education, not alone in India and Pakistan, but throughout the whole Muslim world.

• THE ALIGARH MOVEMENT¹

This revolutionary, modernizing movement in Indian Islam in which Sir Syed took the lead came at a time when there was a growing number of Muslims of position and influence who were of the same mind, and who were ready to support him and follow his leadership. In fact the time was ripe for the very sort of revolution in Indian Islam of which he now became the leader. In addition to Nawāb Abd-ul-Latif, already mentioned, he found a loyal supporter in Maulvi Chirāgh Alī, a frequent contributor to his Tahzīb-ul-Akhlāq and whose liberal interpretation of Islam was in complete harmony with the Aligarh programme.

Another of his strong supporters was Syed Madhī Alī known as Muhsin-ul-Mulk. He became a leader in the Muhammadan Educational Conference, and became the successor to Sir Syed as secretary of the Aligarh College. He was also one of the group of founders of the Muslim League in 1906 the organization which ultimately became the instrument for the full expression of Islamic nationalism in India and paved the way for Pakistan.

Other important personalities who were contemporaries of Sir Syed and who did much to strengthen and popularize the programme of the modernization of Islam which he had initiated were : Professor S. Khuda Bakhsh of Calcutta with his The Spirit of Islam (1912); another was the poet Altāf Husain Hālī, whose well-known poem in Urdu, Musaddas-i-Hālī, was most effective in helping the Muslim community to understand the efforts of Sir Syed and his group of followers in their attempt to adjust Islam to the modern conditions which surround it. Also included in this group of ardent believers in the modernization of Islam were the novelist Nazir Ahmad, who made the first translation of the Qur'an into literary Urdu, and Shah Wali Allah both of whom were from Delhi.

¹ Wilfred C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, pp. 23-43.

But perhaps the most important of all the associates of Sir Syed Ahmad was his great friend Muhammad Shibli Nu'mani (1857-1914). He was a strong conservative in religion, and had studied in Madinah when on pilgrimage. However, he entered his younger brother in the new Muslim College in Aligarh and was persuaded by Sir Syed to become the lecturer in Arabic and Persian which position he held for sixteen years, until the death of Sir Syed in 1898.

Sir Syed Ahmad had also been greatly interested in the reform of education in the Muslim theological schools or madrassahs. In order to accomplish this a society was formed in Lucknow in 1890 which was called the Nadwat-ul-'Ulama.' Five years later, this society laid the foundation of a theological college or Dār-ul-'Ulūm, for the training of maulvis on somewhat modernized lines as indicated by the aims of the society as shown herewith :

To create a feeling of harmony and sympathy in the different sections of the 'ulamās, and to centralize their strength so that they may be able to keep up religious and social traditions of the community with the help of mutual consultation.

To create good-will between the different sects of the community, with a view to bringing about an end to the everyday quarrels. The only remedy, for this is education, specially that offered by the Nadwa.

To bring about such changes in the present Arabic course as would prove beneficial to literature, and to the understanding of the Qur'an, and which may prove useful according to the needs of the day. In such a way, 'ulamās will be produced by the institute, who will be able to lead the community rightly in the light of modern requirements.

To propagate the religion by educating the ignorant masses.¹

In 1908 when Maulana Muhammad Shibli Nu'mani became principal of Nadwat-ul-'Ulamā,' it was hoped that he would be able to 'lead the community rightly in the light of modern requirements.' However, he was able to achieve little in the way of 'modernizing' the ideas of the 'ulamā'.

¹ Nawāb Hisām-ul-Mulk, in the Muslim Outlook, Lahore, April 13, 1924.

he was training. But, he did succeed in founding a school for writers in Azamgarh, U.P., called Dār-ul-Musannifin which is commonly known as Shibli's Academy. Its purpose is to develop writers skilled in maintaining the best traditions of Muslim learning.

One of the fruitful sources for the enrichment of Islamic culture which Sir Syed Ahmad early discovered was the vast treasure contained in English literature and scientific books. With an intense desire to unlock this treasure-house of western knowledge, he not only urged that the British Government should provide translations for Indians in their own vernaculars, but he even set about having some of it done through his own private press at Ghazipur, and later at Aligarh. He did not, however, stress the idea that higher education should be through the vernaculars, as some are doing at the present. Nevertheless, it is but fair to assume that the work of Sir Syed, in arousing an interest in western learning and methods of education, did pave the way for the interesting experiment in higher education through the medium of Urdū, the Muslim national language of India and Pakistan which was carried out in Hyderabad, Deccan, under the patronage of His Exalted Highness the Nizām. The Osmānia University, came into being in 1917, in accordance with a firmān (order) issued by the Nizām, which set forth the purpose of this unique experiment :

I am pleased to express my approval . . . regarding the inauguration of a university in the state, in which the knowledge and culture of ancient and modern times may be blended so harmoniously as to remove the defects created by the present system of education and full advantage may be taken of all that is best in the ancient and modern systems of physical, intellectual, and spiritual culture. In addition to its primary object to diffuse knowledge, it should aim at the moral training of students and give an impetus to research in all scientific subjects. The fundamental principle in the working of the university should be that Urdū should form the medium of higher education, but that a knowledge of English as a language should at the same time be deemed compulsory for all students. With this object in view I am pleased to order that steps be taken for the inauguration of a university for the Dominion, to be called the Osmānia University of Hyderabad, in commemoration of my accession to the throne.¹

¹ Prospectus of the Osmānia University, 4, 5.

However, modern scientific and historical books suitable for higher education in Urdu, were not available. Hence the first task was to establish a Bureau of Translation, and to set up a modern steam-lithographic press. The work of this Bureau deserves the highest praise for the manner in which it performed a most difficult task. The works translated from English include the whole range of university studies: history, philosophy, economics, mathematics, physics, chemistry, biology, and law. Altogether the Bureau of Translation compiled and completed text-books to the number of about 400 which have been published.

In the pursuit of this policy the Osmania University carried on until about 1950 when the Bureau of Translation was closed, following the change of Government, which resulted in fundamental changes in the objective and methods which were adopted at the beginning. It is no longer a special Muslim institution, but serves all communities. Urdu is no longer the medium of instruction, but candidates are permitted to answer question papers either in Urdu or Hindi, and English is used as the medium of instruction. The University does, however, maintain a Department of Publication and the Osmania University Press.

MUSLIM ORGANIZATION EXPRESSIVE OF NEW LIFE

Sir Syed and his associates did more than establish a new institution of learning in Aligarh. They succeeded in rousing to new life the whole of Indian Islam. There are multitudes of humble Muslims who, though they are not aware of it, owe their present educational aspirations for their sons and daughters to the indefatigable efforts of him who spent his life in unselfish service for such as they. This newness of life soon began to show itself in a large number of associations (anjumans) which sprang up all over the country.

One of these important organizations was the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference which was founded in 1886 by Sir Syed Ahmad Khān and had for its object the promotion of western learning among Muslims. The All-India Muslim League was organized in 1906, for the purpose of giving special attention to the political interests of the community, inasmuch as some people had come to feel that the policy of Sir Syed in abstaining from taking an active part in the political life of the country, had caused Muslim interests to suffer. For the most part from its inception the League functioned regularly through annual meetings, and through provincial leagues, which were affiliated to the central organization.

During the first quarter of this century the Muslim community in India developed an amazing amount of new life and activity. In addition to that already referred to, the following require special notice also. The learned theologians organized the Jam'iyat-ul-'Ulamā-i-Hind with provincial branches. The Central Jam'iyat-i-Tabligh-ul-Islām (Society for the Propagation of Islam) became a strong, growing organization of India-wide character, with not only provincial but district organizations as well. Its twofold task was (1) to prevent apostasy by seeking to counteract the efforts of the Arya Samaj Shuddhi Movement, and the work of Christian Missions¹; and (2) to send missionaries to teach backward Muslims. To accomplish these objects a campaign was carried on to raise twenty-five lakhs of rupees (Rs. 25,00,000 or about £190,000).² Also in almost every important town there was an Anjuman-i-Islamiyah, looking after the local Muslim educational interests. One of the strongest of these was the Anjuman-i-Himayat-i-Islam of Lahore, which undertook a variety of duties, such as the refutation of objections to Islam, the care of Muslim orphans, and the employment of preachers. It established schools and orphanages and maintained a college affiliated with the Punjab University.

Another all-India organization of a political character, which functioned for a time was the Central Khilāfat Committee of Bombay, with an extensive network of provincial and local bodies. For a time this India-wide organization took over the political interests of the Muslim community from the All-India Muslim League, not only for the purpose of joining the Congress in an attempt to secure political control of India, but also to guard the extra-national interests of Indian Muslims with regard to the sovereignty of Turkey and the dignity of the caliphate. Enormous funds were gathered for the central committee, from rich and poor alike, from every Muslim hamlet in the country.

¹ The Shuddhī Movement seeks to win back to the fold of Hinduism some of those tribes which were formerly converted to Islam. The movement has been most active among the Malkāna Muslims of the Agra, district.

² A Plea and an Appeal, by the General Secretary of the Central Jam'iyat--Tabligh-ul-Islām, Ambala City, Punjab, June 1926.

JĀMIA MILLĪA ISLĀMĪA

It was at this juncture of affairs, when the fate of the Muslim caliphate in Turkey was at stake, and the political future of India was uncertain, that a scheme of 'nationalist' education was initiated. 'National' schools, supported by local Khilāfat committees, sprang up everywhere, and the whole programme was perfected by the establishing at Aligarh of the National Muslim University—Jāmia Millīa Islāmīa—in the year 1920. It was founded as the expression of an educational revolt against the formal and stereotyped pattern of education that developed through the 19th and 20th centuries under the guidance and influence of western-trained leaders.

This educational revolt was also an expression of the growing nationalist spirit that was clamouring for independence, and a free India. It was founded under the leadership of Maulana Muhammad Ali, the head of the Khilafat movement, who was also its first principal. Associated with him were Maulana Mahmud-ul-Hasan, Principal of the Dār-ul-'Ulūm, Deoband, and Mahatma M. K. Gandhi—all three ardent nationalists. It managed to survive the difficulties of the early days when all it had for improvised quarters were tents and a few out-houses.

Finally these hard days ended and in 1925 the institution was moved from Aligarh to Jāmia Nagar near Delhi, where the initial units of the College plant were constructed with the aid of grants from the Central Government in Delhi. The college staff at first served the institution on a sacrificial basis. Shortly after the founding of the college the staff members, including the principal, pledged themselves to serve the institution for twenty years on not more than one hundred and fifty rupees per month. For a long period this sacrificial rate of remuneration was never exceeded and seldom equalled.

The Jāmia was most fortunate through the early and difficult years in having as its principal Dr. Zakir Husain. Equipped with sound training and scholarship, as well as practical experience, his wise and devoted leadership has given to the institution a large measure of success. The Jāmia's reputation has travelled far, and its degrees are recognized by universities in Germany, France and the United States. It has on its staff men who hold degrees from British, American and continental universities.

The Jāmia course of study covers a period of sixteen years, in three stages: the kindergarten and primary department (six years), the middle and high school (six years), and the university (four years). Urdu is the language of instruction, and the Urdu Academy publishes serious literature in that language. However, English is a compulsory subject throughout the curriculum.

The Indian Universities Commission in its 1948-49 Report on the Jāmia Millia mentions four characteristic features which give it an individual status among the universities of India. The first to be noted is its autonomy. It manages its affairs independently of any Government control. Secondly, it follows the basic principles that education must 'comprehend the whole of society and all spheres of social life . . . and that every individual citizen who receives education must be able to discover his function in life.' The third characteristic of the Jāmia Millia has been the belief that true education leads to co-operation, unity, and peace. The founders of the Jāmia Millia felt that religious discord and the political and social problems it created could be resolved only by a proper study of the different Indian religions. They were themselves working together for common political objectives, and they entrusted to the Jāmia Millia the function of demonstrating that the Indian Muslim would be a better citizen of India and of the world if he were educated to be a good Muslim, and that a university which called itself national and Muslim would provide a better atmosphere of co-operation than secular institutions where deeper values inherent were ignored. This expectation has been amply justified. The fourth characteristic of the Jāmia Millia may best be described as a sensitiveness to the needs of the country and willingness to contribute its own share toward fulfilling them.'

Today the financial affairs of the Jāmia Millīa have greatly improved. The hard times are over. The latest report indicates that the early austerities have been superseded as the highest salary paid in a recent year was Rs. 440 per month! Dr. Zakir Husain, its principal until recently, who brought it through the difficult period of its development after its removal from Aligarh to Jāmia Nagar, was so successful that he was persuaded to become the Vice-Chancellor of the Aligarh Muslim University. His successor as Sheikh-ul-Jāmia, or Vice-Chancellor, is M. Mujeeb, who gives a most hopeful outlook for the future of this unique institution in a closing paragraph of a personal letter :

'Partition has served to clarify our position. We have retained without question our name, our character, and our medium of instruction (Urdu). Hindu and Muslim boys share our attention and affection equally. The Ministry of Education is giving us grants and advances for printing our adult education literature. Even if we were jealous we could not ask for more. Our life is not wanting in the spice of struggle; but while before independence our struggle was for survival, now it is for growth!'

CONCLUSION

The past century-and-a-half has witnessed a revolution in the Islamic thought and life of India, which faithfully corresponds to the changes which have developed generally throughout the Muslim World as a whole. Stirred, at first, by bitter resentment at the foreign non-Muslim rule which prevailed in the country, and further aroused by the inflammatory influence of puritanical Wahhābism, a strong reactionary movement developed. This threatened, for a time, to block all progress and keep the Muslim community imprisoned behind walls of ignorance and effete medievalism.

Then came the awakening, the birth of a new spirit and the dawn of a new day. This was brought about by the leadership of men who glimpsed the possibilities which modern science had ushered into the world. Men who were determined that the Muslim community of India should not be left behind. Therefore, it is indeed safe to say, that the Muslims of India and Pakistan together owe a lasting debt of gratitude to the great 'apostle of reconciliation', Sir Syed Ahmad Khān, who had the vision and determination to plot the course and arouse the spirit in his people which would ultimately bring them to their 'Promised Land'. Without realising the full significance of his aim and effort at the time, Sir Syed may well be likened to Moses who led his people the Israelites, to their 'Promised Land'!

CHAPTER X

THE PARTING OF THE WAYS

In India, community consciousness, based on religion, has been a potent factor in determining its historical development from the very beginning of the Muslim invasion in A.D. 711. Tension at this point was especially marked at the time of Maḥmūd of Ghaznī, whose devastating attacks on Hinduism, beginning with the year A.D. 1001, left an indelible imprint on the Hindu community. At the same time an equally profound conviction gripped the growing Muslim community: the worshippers of Allah, the ONE true God, should have no dealings with the Hindu polytheists. Thus a deep-seated communal antagonism based on religion at once took root in the country. This spread with the expansion of Islam in all directions, and as time passed proved to be ineradicable.

This conflict in religious ideology and practice, more than anything else, apart from economic factors unfavourable to the Muslims, operated as one of the finally determining reasons for the Muslim insistence on the partition of India. This is graphically demonstrated by Kingsley Davis in his illuminating book, The Population of India and Pakistan.¹ He vividly pictures the situation in the following manner:

Two more contrasting religions would be difficult to find. Islam was rigorously monotheistic, Hinduism profusely polytheistic. Islam abhorred idolatry, Hinduism adored it. Islam had one sacred book, Hinduism had a variegated and conflicting literature. Islam had a relatively uniform dogma, and was intolerant of all other religions, conceiving itself to have a divine mission to conquer the world in the name of ALLAH, the one and only true God. Hinduism, embracing nearly every form of belief and ritual known to man, had no definite or uniform dogma and was tolerant and passive with respect to other religions. Islam gained by military conquest and aggressive proselytism. Hinduism gained by passive resistance and peaceful absorption.

¹ The Population of India and Pakistan, p. 195 f., Princeton University Press, 1951.

On the side of ritual, the contrast was equally great. Not only did Muslims eat beef, but once a year they sacrificed cows, to the horror of the cow-venerating and beef-abstaining Hindus. The Muslims buried their dead, the Hindus burned theirs. The Muslims worshipped by one calendar, the Hindus by another, with the result that ceremonies of special importance to each group occasionally coincided—an anniversary of Muslim mourning, for example, synchronizing with a day of Hindu rejoicing. The Muslims abhorred music in connection with sacred ceremonies; the Hindus liked it; hence resentment arose when a Hindu procession with band playing and an idol aloft would pass a mosque where Muslims were worshipping. To express hostility, the Muslims would sometimes slaughter cows, or destroy a Hindu temple. The Hindus would throw a pig into a Muslim quarter or desecrate a mosque.

Various other factors contributed to the strengthening of this growing spirit of communalism in addition to the basic differences in religious practices of Hindus and Muslims. The Muslim converts were mostly drawn from the lower and outcaste groups, which produced an inevitable social cleavage. At the same time, definite economic differences developed between the two communities, Hindus being far in advance of Muslims in material progress. Furthermore, in recent times, this separatist tendency was made all the more obvious and concrete through the Census, which regularly has reported the Hindu and Muslim figures separately along with those of the Sikhs, Christians and others.

But in spite of these separatist tendencies, sincere efforts were made from time to time to promote Hindu-Muslim unity. The first attempt of this sort was the founding of the Indian Association of Calcutta in the year 1875. This was followed ten years later by another and more important effort, when the Indian National Congress assembled for the first time in Bombay in 1885. Though the number of Muslims who joined the Congress at first was small, it gradually increased.

This happy association was not to last indefinitely. In 1905 the partition of Bengal on communal lines produced a tense situation between Hindus and Muslims, which in 1906 resulted in the formation of the Muslim League. Communalism in Indian politics was now definitely established. From here on it did not take long to develop the next step: that Muslims were not merely a separate community in India, but a separate nation as well. Thus Communalism speedily evolved into Nationalism!

At the same time, there were some Muslim groups that refused to go along with the strict 'communalists'. As Wilfred C. Smith observes,¹ 'almost without exception, the orthodox religionists, the theological academies, the mullās, and so on, have been opposed to the Muslim League and its communalist attitude, and have worked for Hindu-Muslim political unity. They have said, in the name of Islam, that Communalism in India is religiously unsound.' Nonetheless, Communalism came to be a confirmed issue in India, and continued to be so in spite of those who strongly opposed it. In fact, important individual Muslims have supported the Congress as Indian Nationalists. Among the orthodox 'ulamā' is Husain Aḥmad Madinī, the head of the important Dār-ul-'Ulūm, Deoband, sometimes called the 'al-Azhar' of India. Others with an India-wide reputation and influence as supporters of the National Congress have been Hakīm Ajmal Khān, Dr. Saif-ud-Dīn Kichlū, and Dr. M. A. Ansari. But the Muslim who has had the longest and most influential part to play in the Congress both before and after Partition is Maulana Abu'l Kalam Azad. He was till 1957, recognized as one of the 'pillars' of the Government of India, where he served in the Cabinet as Minister for Education.

RELIGIOUS COMMUNALISM THE CAUSE OF PARTITION

So far as the Muslim League is concerned, there is no doubt whatever that the basic cause for the partition of India was the development of a strong religious communalism. This is made perfectly clear in a statement to the Press² by the late Sir Muhammad Yaqūb, M.L.A. which reads as follows:

The election manifesto issued by the All-India Hindu Mahasabha, urging Hindus in the United Provinces to unite and form a formidable organization, shows clearly to what an unfortunate extent communalism has permeated our body politic. The manifesto means that the Hindus in the U.P., by virtue of their majority should offer organized opposition to the Muslims and dominate them. This is the ne plus ultra of a petty communal outlook. It is the existence and malicious propaganda of these communal bodies that have seriously arrested India's political progress.

¹ W. C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, p. 214, Minerva Press, Lahore.

² The Statesman, Calcutta, 11th February, 1937.

The Hindu Mahasabha, in raising its voice against minor advantages that have accrued to Muslims, only demonstrates its inability to have a catholic and broad outlook. It is only when a minority is in danger of its very existence, when it finds the attitude of the majority one of aggression that it falls back upon extraneous aid, and looks to safeguards and reservations.

It is too late in the day to talk of domination and political annihilation of a minority by the majority. To entertain the belief of 'India for the Hindus' at such a stage in our political development, not only lays bare the hollowness of the supposed nationalism of the Hindu Mahasabha, but also strikes at the root of those forces which happily are tending towards a better understanding between the two communities. In the last analysis, what does it mean? That the Hindus who are in a minority in the provinces of the Punjab, Bengal and Sind should make use of their majorities in the remaining provinces towards asserting this preposterous claim of Hindu Raj and driving Muslims to the wall.

On the other hand, as late as March 1940 there was evidence that not all Muslim groups were committed to Islamic Nationalism and the partition of India. That month in Delhi, representatives of the Muslim nationalist groups including the Congress Muslims, Ahrārs, Jamiyat-ul-'Ulamā' and the Shī'ah Political Conference gathered to oppose the idea of Partition and Pakistan. They backed the proposal of the Congress for a free India. They also proposed that the Congress and League should press for a 'nationalist independent government.' But the hour was too late!¹

THE PAKISTAN MOVEMENT

Following the collapse of the Khilāfat Committee's efforts to preserve the out-moded office of the Khalīfa for the Muslims of India and the world, the gulf between the Congress and the Muslim League at once began to widen. The supporters of Hindu-Muslim Unity like Lala Lajpat Rai and Hazrat Mohani gave up hope. The latter proposed the creation of separate Muslim states in India united with Hindu states under a common Federal Government—a United States of India. Lala Lajpat Rai, on the other hand, proposed 'the partitioning of India into Muslim India and non-Muslim India... the former comprising the four Provinces of North-West Frontier, Western Punjab, Sind and Eastern Bengal.'¹ However, the suggestion that really fired the imagination and roused the spirit of Muslims throughout the country was that made by the great poet-philosopher, Sir Muhammad Iqbal of Lahore. It was he 'who, for the first time, visualised the idea of a single State for the predominantly Muslim units of North-West India.' In his Presidential address to the Allahabad Session of the All-India Muslim League in 1930, he had suggested:

¹ W. C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, p. 269, Minerva Press, Lahore.

I would like to see the Punjab, the North-West Frontier Province, Sind and Baluchistan formed into a single State. Self-government within the British Empire or without the British Empire appears to me to be the final destiny of the Muslims at least of North-West India.'²

Thus Iqbal's name will always be associated with the birth of Pakistan; and the arousing of the Muslim masses of India to achieve their ultimate political destiny, is reckoned as his greatest contribution to the Muslim cause. In a sense, the creation of Pakistan in the latter part of his life became a consuming passion so that his writings, both poetical and philosophical, are more appreciated now than ever before.

From this time, onward, the political struggle in India became a three-cornered affair, with Congress and the League demanding complete independence. However, at the same time, the League demanded the partition of India, while the Congress opposed partition and demanded Indian unity.

It was not until 1933 that the beginning of the end of this impasse became apparent or likely. The three Round Table Conferences held in London, 1930-1933 ended without finding any wholly satisfactory solution for the opposing viewpoints. Just at this critical juncture, some Muslim students from India under the leadership of C. Rahmat

¹ Pakistan Govt. Publication, The Struggle of a Nation, p. 28.

² Ibid., p. 29.

Ali, a post-graduate student in Cambridge University, organised in January, 1933 The Pakistan National Movement. The name is of composite origin, devised to meet the needs of the hour. It is derived from the names of the predominantly Muslim areas of North-west India of that time: Punjab, Afghanistan (North-west Frontier Province of which the inhabitants are mainly Afghans), Kashmir, Sind, and the last syllable of Baluchis TAN... PAKISTAN. Thus it was largely as a result of the ingenuity and enthusiastic efforts of this group of Cambridge students in devising the name PAKISTAN as a slogan for their Pakistan National Movement, that on March 23rd, 1940 at Lahore, under the presidency of Quaid-i-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah, the All-India Muslim League officially adopted the historic Pakistan Resolution:—

Resolved that it is the considered view of this session of The All-India Muslim League that no constitutional plan would be workable in this country, nor acceptable to Muslims unless it is designed on the following basic principle,—that geographically contiguous units are demarcated into regions, which should be so constituted, with such territorial readjustments as may be necessary, that the areas in which the Muslims are numerically in a majority, as in the North-western and Eastern zones of India, should be grouped to constitute Independent States in which the constituent units shall be autonomous and sovereign.¹

It is said that this session of the League was attended by not less than 100,000 members.² From here on Pakistan became the national goal of the Muslims of India, and Muhammad Ali Jinnah their undisputed Great Leader (Quaid-i-Azam)! In Pakistan alone could they live according to the ideals and spirit of Islam; retain and develop the full measure of self-respect and national pride which is their historic heritage.³ Therefore, the Muslim League proceeded, with more determination than ever, to press for partition and the creation of an Islamic State.

Undoubtedly, much of the enthusiasm aroused for partition was due, also, to the fear of economic and political domination and exploitation by the majority Hindu community. This was graphically and tersely explained to me one day by a former prominent citizen of Lucknow, now equally prominent in Karachi. He put it this way: 'We Muslims would rather be slaves of the British than slaves of the Hindus.' Therefore, Pakistan became an inspiring national goal, a thrilling challenge, a hope to live for! The urgent, practical problems of the future that were to emerge in the process of realization: the fixing of boundaries, the transfer of populations, the financial and property problems, the horrible suffering and slaughter—these and many other problems could not be foreseen, so powerful was the enchanting enthusiasm that the vision of PAKISTAN aroused in the hearts of its leaders and followers alike. It was as though with one heart and voice the millions shouted to the world... 'Whatever it costs we must have it! Pakistan zindabad!'¹

¹ W. C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, p. 295, Minerva Press, Lahore.

² Pakistan Govt. Publication, The Struggle of a Nation, p. 29.

³ Ibid., p. 30.

PAKISTAN IS BORN

As already noted, clashes between Hindus and Muslims in India have not been uncommon through the centuries in which they have intermingled. In fact, communal strife between the two communities has more or less been taken for granted. But when the political factor becomes involved as well, then the struggle is intensified to the utmost. This was the situation on Pakistan Day, August 14th, 1947. On that day the historic Pakistan Resolution of the Muslim League became a reality. The British Government and the National Congress had acceded to the demand of the Muslim League for the partition of India. The boundary commissions had carefully carried out their instructions both in Bengal (East Pakistan), and in the Punjab (West Pakistan). Both countries, India and Pakistan, duly celebrated the simultaneous birth of their freedom and independence.

Joy there was! But also widespread and intense sorrow and suffering for Muslims as well as for Hindus and Sikhs. Even before this date, fear had driven multitudes from their homes... in vast caravans... Hindus and Sikhs moving eastward out of West Pakistan into India and Muslim caravans moving westward out of India into Pakistan. This two-way refugee movement grew from day to day and became one of the largest mass migrations in all history. It is estimated that no less than six million Muslims came into West Pakistan, and about the same number of Hindus and Sikhs left it for India. At the same time West Bengal received an estimated one and a half million refugees from East Pakistan.

¹The popular slogan, 'Pakistan live forever!'

The result of this sudden, tremendous and unorganized two-way migration was the creation of immense refugee problems in both India and Pakistan. Delhi and surrounding areas became one vast refugee camp, while Lahore was faced with the same problem as thousands and thousands of refugees continued to pour in daily from the opposite direction. In addition to all this confusion and loss of life, thousands of women were abducted. However, most of these were fortunately recovered. So intense was the human anguish and suffering arising from the creation of Pakistan, that the event may best be described as the 'birth pangs' of a nation. But, by the end of the first five years, the worst was over and Pakistan has since rapidly proceeded to develop her own way of life politically, economically, culturally, nationally and internationally according to her own genius.

THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF PAKISTAN

Pakistan is the largest Muslim State in the world. It has a Muslim population alone of more than 65 millions, or 86 per cent of its total. It may best be described as an Islamic democracy, for it is not narrowly or oppressively Islamic. Its official title, as found in its Constitution, is The Islamic Republic of Pakistan. This title fully expresses and reflects the spirit and genius of its statesman-founder, Quaid-i-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah, its first Governor General. In an address¹ he delivered to the Constituent Assembly in Karachi in August, 1947 he declared :—

The first observation I would like to make is this . . . the first duty of a Government is to maintain law and order so that life, property and religious beliefs of its subjects are fully protected by the State.

¹ Govt. of Pakistan Publication, The Struggle of a Nation, p. 37.

Now, if we want to make this State of Pakistan happy and prosperous, we should wholly and solely concentrate on the well-being of the people, and especially the masses and the poor. If you will work in co-operation, forgetting the past, burying the hatchet, you are bound to succeed. If you can forget your past and work together in a spirit that every one of you, no matter to what community he belongs, no matter what his colour, caste or creed, is first, second and last a citizen of this State with equal rights, privileges, and obligations, there will be no end to the progress you will make.

You are free. You are free to go to your temples, you are free to go to your mosques, or to any other places of worship in this State of Pakistan. You may belong to any religion or caste or creed—that has nothing to do with the business of the State.

As for Pakistan's international relations, it has declared its intention to 'work in a spirit of harmony and friendship with all the nations of the world. And it has assured the world that its voice will always be raised in defence of liberty, justice and democracy.'¹

PAKISTAN LAYS ITS FOUNDATIONS

The task of starting the operation of a wholly new government of a wholly new State in an entirely new location under the most appalling circumstances of confusion and general disorder, proved to be so tremendous an undertaking that important and essential transactions were inevitably delayed. The confusion and emergency problems growing out of the two-way migration required many months and endless patience to reach even the merest semblance of a solution. It is little wonder, therefore, that nearly nine years elapsed between the birth of Pakistan on August 14th, 1947, when Quaid-i-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah took over the reins as Governor General, and the 23rd March, 1956, when Major General Iskandar Mirza ceased to be Governor General and was installed as the first President of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. And further, it was announced that this date will henceforth be celebrated as the Nation-Day, corresponding to the Fourth of July in America. There are, therefore, three very important dates to remember in the calendar of Pakistan:

August 14, 1947—The Birthday of Pakistan.

¹ Govt. of Pakistan Publication, The Struggle of a Nation, p. 38.

February 29, 1956—Constitution Day, when the Constitution was finalised.

March 23rd, 1956—when the first President was installed, which will henceforth be celebrated as National Day.

This long delay in the finalising of the Constitution was due to the double burden that was laid on the shoulders of the Constituent Assembly in having to function as the Parliament of the country as well! From March 23, 1956, therefore, Pakistan entered into a new phase of its development, one which, it is hoped, will fully demonstrate the clear foresight and wisdom of its illustrious founder. It is reported that representatives of forty nations attended the important ceremonies held in Karachi on that date.

The framing and adoption of the Constitution of this new Islamic Republic of Pakistan had taken just short of nine years. During that period the framers of this historic document, the Constituent Assembly, had followed the guidance of the Objectives Resolution, which, with certain alterations, has now become the Preamble of the Constitution, and reads as follows :

PREAMBLE¹

to

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE ISLAMIC REPUBLIC OF PAKISTAN

In the name of Allāh, the Beneficent, the Merciful

Whereas sovereignty over the entire Universe belongs to Allāh Almighty alone, and the authority to be exercised by the people of Pakistan within the limits prescribed by Him is a sacred trust ;

Whereas the Founder of Pakistan, Quaid-i-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah, declared that Pakistan would be a democratic State based on Islamic principles of social justice ;

And whereas the Constituent Assembly, representing the people of Pakistan, have resolved to frame for the sovereign independent State of Pakistan a constitution ;

Wherein the State should exercise its powers and authority through the chosen representatives of the people ;

¹ The Constitution of Pakistan, p. 1, Govt. of Pakistan Press, Karachi.

Wherein the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam should be fully observed ;

Wherein the Muslims of Pakistan should be enabled individually and collectively to order their lives in accordance with the teachings and requirements of Islam, as set out in the Holy Quran and Sunnah ;

Wherein adequate provision should be made for the minorities freely to profess and practise their religion and develop their culture ;

Wherein the territories now included in or in accession with Pakistan and such other territories as may hereafter be included in or accede to Pakistan should form a Federation, wherein the provinces would be autonomous with such limitations on their powers and authority as might be prescribed ;

Wherein should be guaranteed fundamental rights including rights such as equality of status and of opportunity, equality before the law, freedom of thought, expression, belief, faith, worship and association, and social, economic and political justice, subject to law and public morality ;

Wherein adequate provision should be made to safeguard the legitimate interests of minorities and backward and depressed classes ;

Wherein the independence of the Judiciary should be fully secured ;

Wherein the integrity of the territories of the Federation, its independence and all its rights, including its sovereign rights over land, sea and air should be safeguarded ;

So that the people of Pakistan may prosper and attain their rightful and honoured place amongst the nations of the world and make their full contribution towards international peace and the progress and happiness of humanity.

NOW THEREFORE, we the people of Pakistan in our Constituent Assembly this Twenty-ninth day of February, 1956, and the seventeenth day of Rajab, 1375, do hereby adopt, enact and give to ourselves this Constitution.

Pakistan was at long last ready to continue its historic career under the guidance of its own basic document, The whole Nation could now justifiably shout : 'Pakistan zindabad !' (Pakistan live forever !)

PAKISTAN'S LIBERAL CONSTITUTION

The Islamic Republic of Pakistan, with a total population of 76,636,000,¹ has two very important non-Muslim communities within its borders : Hindus and Christians. It is necessary, therefore, to observe how they will be affected by the Constitution of this Islamic Republic. Herewith are presented the most important sections which especially apply to non-Muslims and clearly reveal the liberal spirit of this new Muslim State.

¹ Pakistan Census Report, 1951.

*Fundamental Rights*¹ :—

5 (1). All citizens are equal before the law and are entitled to equal protection of law.

13 (1). No person attending any educational institution shall be required to receive religious instruction, or take part in any religious ceremony, or attend religious worship, if such instruction, ceremony or worship relates to a religion other than his own.

13 (5). Every religious community or denomination shall have the right to establish and maintain educational institutions of its own choice, and the State shall not deny recognition to any such institution on the ground only that the management of such institution vests in that community or denomination.

18. Subject to law, public order and morality: every citizen has the right to profess, practise and propagate any religion; every religious denomination and every sect thereof has the right to establish, maintain and manage its own religious institutions.

20. Untouchability is abolished, and its practice in any form is forbidden, and shall be declared by law to be an offence.

In addition to the above, attention should be drawn to certain General Principles of State Policy which relate to the following important Islamic subjects :

Muslim Unity and International Peace :²

It shall be a special effort of the State to endeavour to strengthen the bonds of unity among Muslim countries, to promote peace and goodwill and friendly relations among all nations, and to encourage the settlement of international disputes by peaceful means.

Similarly all possible steps are to be taken to enable the Muslims :—

To order their lives in accordance with the Holy Quran and Sunnah; to provide facilities whereby they may be enabled to understand the meaning of life according to the Holy Quran and Sunnah; to make the teaching of the Quran compulsory; to promote unity and observance of Islamic moral standards; and to secure the proper organization of zakāt,³ waqf,⁴ and mosques.

¹ Pakistan Constitution, pp. 3, 4, 6.

² Pakistan Constitution, pp. 6, 7.

³ The 'legal tithe', 1/40 of one's income.

⁴ Religious endowments.

Also, the State is concerned with *Social Uplift*¹ and it proposes to

- (a) promote, with special care, the educational and economic interests of the people of the Special Areas, the backward classes and the Scheduled Castes ;
- (b) remove illiteracy, and provide free and compulsory primary education as soon as possible ;
- (c) make provision for securing just and humane conditions of work, especially for women and children including maternity benefits for women in employment ;
- (d) prevent prostitution, gambling and the taking of injurious drugs ; and
- (e) prevent consumption of alcoholic liquor, otherwise than for medicinal, and in the case of non-Muslims, religious purposes.

Pakistan is also seriously concerned with the social and economic well-being of the people and its Constitution declares that :

The State shall endeavour to

- (a) promote the educational and economic interests of the people irrespective of caste, creed, or race by raising the standard of living of the common man, by preventing the concentration of wealth and means of production and distribution in the hands of a few to the detriment of the interests of the common man and by ensuring equitable adjustment of rights between employers and employees, and landlords and tenants ;
- (b) provide for all citizens as far as possible facilities for work and adequate livelihood with reasonable rest and leisure ;
- (c) provide for all persons in the service of Pakistan and private concerns social security by means of compulsory social insurance or otherwise ;
- (d) provide basic necessities of life such as food, clothing, housing, education and medical relief, for all such citizens, irrespective of caste, creed or race as are permanently or temporarily unable to earn their livelihood on account of infirmity, sickness, or unemployment ;
- (e) eliminate riba (usury or high interest on loans) as early as possible.

One of the specific *Islamic requirements*² of the Constitution is that the President of Pakistan shall be a Muslim. This is the first requirement, and no person shall hold office as President for more than two terms of five years each.

¹ Pakistan Constitution, Arts. 28, 29, pp. 7-8.

² Ibid., Arts. 32, 33, pp. 8-9.

Interestingly enough, this is the only office in the State specifically reserved for Muslims.

Provision for women as members of Parliament is made as follows :

For a period of ten years from Constitution Day, ten seats shall be reserved for women members only, of whom five shall be elected by constituencies in East Pakistan, and five by constituencies in West Pakistan.¹

Similarly, ten seats shall be reserved for women members only in each Provincial Assembly. This, though a small concession, does give the women of Pakistan a real, though meagre, chance to show what they can do in public life, which is far better than being left out altogether.

Concern has been expressed by Muslims, from time to time, about the present state of Muslim society, and how it has drifted away, in various respects, from the true Islamic basis. It is felt that an attempt should be made in a new Muslim state like Pakistan to take careful account of this situation. The Constitution, therefore makes provision for the President to set up an organization for Islamic research and instruction in advanced studies to assist in 'the reconstruction of Muslim society on a truly Islamic basis.'²

It is specified that :

No law shall be enacted which is repugnant to the Injunctions of Islam as laid down in the Holy Qur'ān and Sunnah . . . and existing law shall be brought into conformity with such Injunctions, though nothing in this Article shall affect the personal laws of non-Muslim citizens.³

The language problem has been settled for bifurcated Pakistan in the following manner :

The State languages of Pakistan shall be Urdu and Bengali : Provided : that for a period of twenty years from Constitution Day, English shall continue to be used for all official purposes for which it was used in Pakistan immediately before the Constitution Day, and Parliament may by Act provide, for the use of English after the expiration of the said period of twenty years, for such purposes as may be specified in the Act.

But there is another aspect of the language problem which is giving considerable concern both to Pakistan and India.

¹ Pakistan Constitution, p. 12, Art. 44 (2).

² Ibid., p. 59, Art. 197 (1).

³ Ibid., p. 59, Art. 198 (1).

It is the question of the language to be used for higher education in the colleges and universities. The original plan, following Partition, was that regional languages should be substituted for English, and this was done extensively throughout both countries. However, from all reports, results have not been altogether satisfactory, and today considerable agitation is going on in both India and Pakistan as to the best policy to be followed. There are some indications that English may again be reinstated for education at the University level.

MUSLIMS IN INDIA SINCE PARTITION

The Muslim population of India according to the 1951 Census¹ was 35,400,117. This is said to be the largest minority to be found anywhere in the world. At that time, the census for the whole of India, exclusive of Jammu and Kashmir,² recorded a total population of 356,879,394 persons, which showed the Muslims represented almost ten per cent of the entire population. Although there was a very large number of Muslims of India who were attracted to Pakistan, and risked the dangers of the exodus to make their way thither at the time of Partition, the situation gradually became stabilized. The Muslims of India who did not migrate to Pakistan at the time of Partition are not to be regarded as any less interested in the creation of this new Muslim State, than those who were already resident therein. In fact, for the most part, their sentiments, hopes and sympathy were naturally identical with those of their more fortunate brethren who already lived across the borders. During the years of political agitation for the partition of India, preceding the creation of Pakistan most were loyal members of the Muslim League, and devoted followers of Quaid-i-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah, who was destined to lead many of his people to the 'Promised Land' of Pakistan.

However, having been left behind in India, and not being able to join their community in Pakistan, they are now expected to be good and loyal citizens in the land of their birth, and completely re-orient themselves amid the new and often frustrating situations which confront them in the New India. Inevitably, the vast majority have come to accept the situation as God's Will (Allāh-kīmarzī) and have gradually adjusted themselves to it. Political parties have ceased to be based on religion as to some extent was the case in pre-Partition days, when the Congress and Muslim League vied with each other for the control of Muslim votes. In other words 'Muslim politics' are no more; India is seriously endeavouring to create a party system based on ideological rather than on religious or communal foundations, which for a secular State, is the sound and logical procedure to follow. Therefore, since India is described in its Constitution as a 'Sovereign Democratic Republic', it would be legally possible for an Indian Muslim some day to become the President or Prime Minister of the country. For, behind them is the guarantee of the Constitution to secure to all its citizens :

¹ Census of India, Paper No. 2, 1953, pp. 6-8 (Religion—1951 Census.)

² Ibid., No. 1, 1952, p. (ii) Est. at 4.41 millions. Of this number Muslims estimated at 2.75 millions.

JUSTICE, social, economic and political ;

LIBERTY, of thought, expression, belief, faith, and worship ;

EQUALITY, of status and of opportunity ;

AND to promote among them ALL

FRATERNITY, assuring the dignity of the individual, and unity of the Nation.¹

Furthermore, in addition to these general statements guaranteeing the rights of the Muslims in India, there are some other important Constitutional provisions among the Fundamental Rights affecting Muslims and all other citizens of India. They are found in the following clauses :

14. The State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or equal protection of the laws within the territory of India.

15. The State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them.

16. There shall be equality of opportunity for all citizens in matters relating to appointment to any office under the State.

¹ The Constitution of India, p. 1.

Right to Freedom of Religion

25. Subject to public order, morality and health . . . all persons are equally entitled to freedom of conscience and the right freely to profess, practise and propagate religion;

(2) Nothing in this article shall affect the operation of any existing law, or prevent the State from making any law :

(a) regulating or restricting any economic, financial, political or other secular activity which may be associated with religious practice ;

(b) Providing for social welfare and reform or the throwing open of Hindu religious institutions of a public character to all classes and sections of Hindus.

26. Subject to public order, morality and health, every religious denomination or section thereof shall have the right

(a) to establish and maintain institutions for religious and charitable purposes,

(b) to manage its own affairs in matters of religion,

(c) to own and acquire moveable and immoveable property, and

(d) to administer such property in accordance with law.

27. No person shall be compelled to pay any taxes the proceeds of which are specifically appropriated in payment of expenses for the promotion or maintenance of any particular religious denomination.

28. (1) No religious instruction shall be provided in any educational institutions wholly maintained out of State funds.

(2) Nothing in clause (1) shall apply to an educational institution which is administered by the State but has been established under any endowment or trust which requires that religious instruction shall be imparted in such institution.

29. (1) Any section of the citizens residing in the territory of India or any part thereof having a distinct language, script or culture of its own shall have the right to conserve the same.

30. All minorities whether based on religion or language shall have the right to establish and administer educational institutions of their choice.

Since the Constitution of the Indian Republic, which came into force on January 26, 1950, guarantees complete political freedom to Muslims, separate communal electorates for Hindus and Muslims naturally have been abolished. The fair treatment accorded Muslims during the interim period did so much to produce confidence and a feeling of security among them, that many who had migrated at the beginning began to return to their former homes in India.

It is most important to observe how the old communal divisions in India are gradually giving place to a wholesome nationalism in which all religious groups may play their part in the building of a strong nation. In this newly organized India it is noteworthy that the Constituent Assembly which drew up the Constitution had no less than 45 Muslims among its members, one of whom, Sir Muhammad Sa'ad Ullah, was a member of the Drafting Committee. In the Indian Parliament (1952) there were 35 Muslim members. Also, there is a fairly representative number of Muslims in the various State Legislatures.

Muslims have been given important posts in the government both of the States, and in the Central Government in Delhi. Maulana Abul Kalam Azad held the portfolio of Education at Delhi; and for a time, until his death, Rafi Ahmad Kidwai was in charge of Communications at the Centre. Among State Governors we find Mr. Asaf Ali, who was formerly India's first Ambassador to the U.S.A., serving as the Governor of Orissa. Muslims are also to be found in the various levels of the Judiciary from the Supreme Court down through courts of the various States, while they are naturally to be found in the various levels of administration in the Army and in the Police Department. In fact, the Muslims have made and are making a noteworthy and substantial contribution to the varied life and over-all administration of the SOVEREIGN DEMOCRATIC REPUBLIC OF INDIA.

Another interesting development is the changing religious outlook of Indian Muslims toward other religions since Partition. Hitherto many Muslims in India have been affected by a deep-seated fanaticism which has been an obstacle in establishing contact and fellowship with other communities. Today, it appears that a process of re-adjustment is taking place. Being a greatly reduced minority community, they realize that they must exercise the utmost care in the observance of some of their religious practices. For instance, they realize that Muharram processions must be so conducted that clashes with Hindus will be avoided. Cow sacrifice at the time of Baqara Id has been almost abandone to avoid the danger of stirring up trouble by breaking the regulations against cow slaughter.

Another evidence of the changing attitude of Muslims toward their non-Muslim neighbours, Hindus especially, is found in certain rural areas where they often join in celebrating Hindu festivals.¹ For instance it is reported that, at the Rāmlilā performances Muslims will often be found sitting with Hindus to witness the enacting of the story of Rām and Sītā. It is said that the Bohras of Surat and Khandesh are tending to excel the Hindus in their illuminations at the Diwālī festival. It is also said that on a certain Raksha Bandhan Day in Jodhpur, 'many Muslim girls tied rakhī (flower bracelets) on the wrists of their Hindu brethren in proof of the minority community's faith in its declaration acknowledging India as its home.'

Education is another important factor which is contributing to the modification of religious thought and social ideas among the Muslims of India. They are increasingly, as a community, coming to see the need for and value of modern education if they are to keep up with the times. They have finally become adjusted to the fact that they are truly citizens of India, and that it is their duty to follow the pattern of such outstanding leaders of their community as Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and his Muslim associates in the Government of India, if they are to make their position secure in the country.

Muslim Politics in India

There is today, of course, no such thing as an exclusively Muslim party in India. Communal politics is a dead issue. However, in spite of the attempts on the part of the Government to discourage the continuance of the Muslim League in India, some Muslim leaders hold that the League is a 'natural necessity' for the Muslim community to look after its interests. So, after a lapse of four years, the League resumed its annual meetings, and assembled in Madras on 3rd December, 1951. It insists that if the minorities are to be protected, then it is important that minority organizations should function in this respect. This insistence is supported on the ground that, since the Constitution of India has granted certain rights to minorities, then the State should have the means to know whether the minorities are satisfied with the 'implementation' of these rights. Therefore the League feels that it is the right and proper organization to speak for the community in regard to these 'constitutional rights'.

¹ Bulletin of the Henry Martyn School, Aligarh, Oct.-Nov., 1954, p. 5.

The Government reaction to this point of view was vigorously expressed by Prime Minister Nehru when the League was revived in Calicut after a lapse of some years. He declared: 'The Muslim League can function by all means. But mind you, we shall fight it tooth and nail all the time. There is not going to be any quarter in this country for communal organizations—Hindu or Muslim.'¹ But in general it may be said that most Indians who were formerly members of the Muslim League before Partition have now joined the Congress.

Similarly, we find the All-India Shī'ah Conference continuing to meet annually to face problems of the Shī'ah community which relate to the social and economic welfare of the Shī'ahs of India. It stresses the fact that it is 'non-political' in character.

Another organization of the Muslim community in India is the well known Jami'yat-ul-'Ulamā-Hind, which, after a lapse of four years, held its 18th annual session in Calcutta in February, 1955. The Jami'yat endeavours to hold itself aloof from politics, but gives itself to the general welfare of the Muslims of India. To this end it did 'take part in all the problems of the Indian Muslims at the time of Partition, and took an active part in helping with the matters of evacuee property, rehabilitation of Muslims, recovery of abducted women, riots, language problems, and many other things.' Its general secretary, Maulana Hifz-ur-Rahman, in his annual report declared that the main purpose of the Jami'yat was to help the Muslims of India to get rid of their inferiority complex.²

Still another important organization dedicated to the educational interests of Muslims in India, which has functioned for more than half a century is the All-India Muslim Educational Conference. Its 56th Annual Session was held, early in 1955 in Madras. A summary of the resolutions passed by the body indicate the awareness of the organization to the rapidly changing times. It requested the Governments of India and Uttar Pradesh to assist the Aligarh Muslim University in the early establishment of both a Medical College and an Agricultural College.

¹ Notes on Islam, Calcutta, Dec. 1955, p. 200 ff.

² Notes on Islam, pp. 30-32, Calcutta, March 1955.

Another resolution called for immediate steps to be taken to improve the religious teaching given to children in the maktabs by providing a common syllabus, and the preparation of easy text books for children.

These various resolutions call attention to the fact that the Muslim community in India today is well aware of the need for adapting the curriculum and text-books of the maktabs to the changing times. It was hoped that suitable arrangements would soon be made in the various Dār-ul-'Ulūm to train teachers for the maktabs.¹

The Theological Conference also proposed that the Principals of the various madrasahs in India should seek to work out a plan for co-ordinating their work and procedure, and carefully to revise and formulate a common syllabus for the higher theological education imparted in them. It will be most interesting to see what real improvements are produced in the output of the madrasahs as the result of such a 'revolutionary' suggestion.

It is quite obvious that the whole Islamic community in India is being affected in one way or another as a result of partition. But it is also encouraging to note that it is gradually and in good spirit making the necessary adjustments which the radically changed circumstances require. And finally, it is clear that, today, Muslims are better adjusted to their situation after nine years experience in The Republic of India,— and have now come to think more in terms of India as their motherland—no longer as their step-motherland—to look ahead rather than to mourn the irretrievable past. The feeling of frustration is gradually giving place to a more realistic outlook. Indian Muslims now begin to realize that they have a role to play in their homeland just as their forefathers had when they adorned it with monuments of world-wide renown. Hence there is noticeable today among Indian Muslims a keener interest in the welfare of the country and more genuine manifestations of devotion to it . . . The recent visits of foreign Heads of Muslim States have stirred feelings of pride for the land of their birth and strengthen hopes for the future.¹

¹ Ibid., pp. 30, 31.

THE KASHMIR ISSUE

The most unfortunate and complicated issue arising from the partition of India in July, 1947 has been that of Jammu and Kashmir. The ruler of the State was at that time a Hindu Maharaja, but the majority of the population is Muslim. The State itself borders on the area of both Pakistan and India. This situation obviously was fraught with tense and explosive possibilities.

The struggle for Kashmir began almost immediately following partition. Raiders moved in as far as Baramulla, threatening the whole Jhelum Valley and Srinagar the capital. This invasion was immediately countered by Indian forces. In fact, the situation was so explosive that the United Nations was approached by both India and Pakistan for aid in securing a settlement of this critical international problem.

The first result of this appeal to the United Nations for intervention in the struggle between India and Pakistan for control of Jammu and Kashmir was the establishing of the Cease Fire Line under the supervision of United Nations observers. The part of Kashmir to the West of this line is now known as Azad Kashmir, and is geographically related to Pakistan. That to the East together with Jammu adjoins India.

The second result of this appeal to the United Nations was the adoption of a resolution by the United Nations Assembly on Jan. 5, 1949, which reads as follows: 'The question of the accession of the State of Jammu and Kashmir to India or Pakistan will be decided through the democratic method of a free and impartial plebiscite.' However, no such plebiscite has been held to the great disappointment of Pakistan.

This, clearly, is the outstanding issue today between India and Pakistan, which has not been mutually resolved. India contends that that Jammu and Kashmir elected and convened a duly qualified Constituent Assembly to draft an instrument of accession, and that this act of formal accession to India took place on January 26, 1957. Pakistan challenges this action, since it was taken without fulfilling the United Nations condition of holding an impartial plebiscite previous to determining whether accession should be to India or Pakistan.

¹ Notes on Islam, Dec. 1955, p. 139, Calcutta.

So far, Azad Kashmir has not been formally integrated with Pakistan since its Constitution, Article 203 assumes that a plebiscite for the entire and undivided State of Jammu and Kashmir would be held in accordance with United Nations' resolution of Jan. 5th, 1949. Since this plebiscite was not held, as anticipated, the status of Azad Kashmir is now left for the Government of Pakistan to determine.

THE MUSLIM WOMAN AND MODERN MOVEMENTS

The ferment of the modern world is also to be found behind the pardah. Although Muslim women in India and Pakistan are still very far behind their men in the matter of literacy, yet increasing efforts are being made to improve this condition. In 1914 the All-India Women's Conference was organized, and held its first meeting. Since then meetings have been held annually in various centres in India. In Pakistan the All-Pakistan Women's Association was started in February, 1949 and it also holds annual meetings. These organizations are doing much to educate public opinion in regard to the improvement of the condition of women.

Some very great changes in Muslim society have been made in the last thirty years which register marked advance. At the All-India Conference in 1924 a resolution was passed which declared against the marriage of girls to men already married. Gradually the pardah system is being forced aside in spite of opposition of the ultra-conservative groups. The number of educated Muslim women who are coming out of seclusion to mix freely, yet modestly, in general society is steadily increasing. There is still a vast amount of prejudice to overcome among the conservatives both in India and Pakistan; but much progress is evident also.

Much of this conservatism is due to the mullās who continue to exert a powerful influence on the uneducated masses. Occasionally, however, one finds examples of extreme conservatism in unexpected places. Take for instance, Her Highness the late Dowager Begam of Bhopal, who, in spite of her own adherence to purdah, was one of the most vigorous leaders in the cause of women in her day. She introduced educational and social reforms for women in her own State; she served with distinction as Chancellor of the Aligarh Muslim University, and in 1928 she was the first president of the newly organized All-India Women's Conference, where she gave her whole-hearted support to the cause of education for girls. Even then, Muslim women were looking hopefully to the future. Today they are increasingly taking matters into their own hands, and have become the chief factor in the growing movement for reforms in keeping with the spirit of these modern times.

In spite of the enormous handicaps that Muslim women have had to overcome, many are increasingly entering different fields of activity. Journalism is one of these. In Lahore the Tahdhīb-un-Niswān, a journal for women, and Phūl, for children, are both edited by women. Another avenue is public life. As early as 1924 a Muslim woman was appointed an honorary magistrate in Bombay, and today such appointments are not uncommon either in India or Pakistan.

In fact, Muslim women in Pakistan, especially, are busy fashioning a 'new day' for themselves. One of the greatest achievements of Pakistan has been the steps taken for the gradual emancipation of women. No longer are they indiscriminately kept behind the purdah as a mark of respectability. No longer is there such an acute shortage of women doctors, trained nurses, teachers and social workers as there was in 1947. The credit for this goes chiefly to Begam Liaquat Ali Khan, widow of the first Prime Minister. It was due to her that the Women's Voluntary Service was organized along with other welfare agencies. Other leading Muslim women have supported her bravely and devotedly.

But this move for the abolition of purdah is by no means universally approved. In fact there are some Muslims who fanatically oppose it. One of these fanatics was the assassin of the first Prime Minister of Pakistan, Nawab Liaqat Ali Khan. This person was profoundly serious in his attitude to pardah, because he was troubled by the failure of so many Muslim women to observe it. He was aroused to such an extent that he was prepared to take any step to register his protest against the growing emancipation of Muslim womanhood. He was a fanatic who could not adjust his thinking to any form of modernism or reform in Islamic practices. But be that as it may, Pakistan is set to move forward, and move forward it will.

Today, Muslim women both in Pakistan and India are steadily widening the range of their occupations. Public health problems are being solved not only with new methods, but also with new personnel. There is an increasing number of women in both countries who are taking training as nurses and are serving in hospitals. At Lahore a new medical college for women has been opened, so that Muslim women can work along side their brothers in the medical profession. The All-Pakistan Women's Association (APWA), in its short history of six years, has done much in the fields of health, social welfare and education. It has been affiliated with the International Alliance of Women, the General Federation of Women's Clubs, and the Association of Country Women of the World. In fact it is contributing greatly to the building of the new Muslim nation.

Nor are the women of Pakistan limited to the various activities and services mentioned above. They are also being trained to do what they can for the defence of their country, as a Women's Defence Corps has been organized. Muslim women are coming more and more to share in the total life and activities of their country alongside their men-folk. Purdah's day is slowly but surely passing away !

Regardless of the Qur'anic law on the subject of polygamy, there is increasing opposition to it, especially among the women of Pakistan. In this new Muslim nation some persons are making a determined effort to check its growth. The marked increase in second marriages during recent years has aroused strong criticism, and a vigorous movement, by no means confined to women, has grown up to counteract it. One brave and out-spoken protagonist of this reform movement is Shaista Suhrawardy Ikramullah, who presents the case for reform in the following manner. Writing in *Dawn*¹ (Karachi, Jan. 16, 1955) he declares :

In the last few years there has been a definite increase in the number of second marriages, and almost without exception, in each case, the rights of the first wife have been completely ignored. In nearly every case there were several children by the first marriage, whose future has been blasted by the gross selfishness of their fathers. But as most of these men have been highly placed, nobody had yet dared to raise a voice of protest against them.

The fact that, in many instances, prominent society ladies themselves were second wives, had also prevented any steps being taken to check this growing evil, with the result that it has now reached the stage when, if strict measures are not taken to curb it, it will destroy the whole fabric of our society. The practice of polygamy has gone too far and has done untold harm, and is continuing to cause great misery and suffering to many women. We must somehow seek to amend the existing divorce laws, so that it should not be easy for men to get rid of their wives.

It is noteworthy, at least, that attempts are being made to improve the status of women in this respect by Muslim reformers, who are sincerely concerned to see some forward steps taken. It is also of interest that the 'banning of polygamy' in Pakistan was on the agenda of the 'Status of Women Conference' held in Karachi, Feb. 22, 1955² under the auspices of the ALL-PAKISTAN WOMEN'S ASSOCIATION. Here, however, a different note was struck by one delegate who said that women outnumbered men in some places. 'Therefore, it was desirable that a certain percentage of able bodied men should have more wives to keep society healthy ! The problem was how to prevent the abuse of the permission to marry more wives than one . . .' Other forward-looking proposals made at the Conference, which show that Muslim women are giving serious consideration to some of these vital domestic problems, include the following :

That the dissolution of marriages should take place through courts of law ; and that the permission of the court should be made necessary for a man seeking to have more than one wife.³

¹ Notes on Islam, Calcutta, March 1955, p. 39.

² Notes on Islam, March 1955, p. 40.

³ Ibid., March 1955, p. 40.

The development of this Feminist Movement in Pakistan is of great social and religious importance to the country. It appears to be gathering momentum in spite of the opposition of orthodox leaders . . . the mullās, who are criticised caustically by the women for their narrow interpretation of the Qur'ān. Fortunately, the Government of Pakistan has appointed a committee of four men and three women to consider 'the grievances of Muslim women and devise means to better the situation.'¹

The Commission on Marriage and Family Laws thus appointed, lost no time in preparing and issuing a searching questionnaire for consideration by the public. The ultimate results of this social and religious reform movement will be awaited with the greatest interest.

Begam Liaquat Ali Khan has done more than any other single individual to champion the cause of 'women's rights' in Pakistan. At the same time she has admirably demonstrated, in her own person, the capacity of women to shoulder their share of the burden of social, national, and international problems confronting her country. As one of the Pakistan delegates in 1953 to the United Nations, she pointed to two things which had done more than anything else to arouse the women of her country to realise their obligations to society. The first was the enfranchisement of women in Pakistan, while the second was the great impact on their social consciousness made by the terrible holocaust which followed 'partition'. She declared :

Overwhelmed by this tragedy the women of Pakistan left the seclusion of their homes, shed their shyness and timidity, and came forward by hundreds to administer relief and succour to suffering humanity.

The experience growing out of this tragic and soul-stirring calamity led to the founding of the All-Pakistan Women's Association, (APWA). To this Association and its work in a wide social field she is sincerely devoted. Since 1954 the Begam Sahiba has been serving her country as its ambassador to the Netherlands. Indeed, this appointment has set an important precedent for the whole Muslim World !

¹ Ibid., Dec. 1955, pp. 137, 138.

THE MUSLIM PRESS

Another direct outcome of the influence of the West on Islam in India and Pakistan is seen in the rapid development of journalism and the Press within the last century. Journalism was begun in a small way by an Englishman in Calcutta in the year 1780. However, even as late as 1858, after the end of the Mutiny, there were only 19 Anglo-Indian papers and 25 Indian papers.¹ In the 1920's the Muslim Press published no less than 238 periodicals in 10 different languages including Urdu, which led the list, with a total of 165 to its credit. The remaining languages employed in order of their importance were English, Gujarati, Bengali, Tamil, Malayalam, Sindhi, Hindi, Arabic and Persian. The total number of such Muslim publications today in Pakistan alone is reported to be 389, according to the figures collected by the Information Ministry. This number includes 75 dailies and 314 weeklies and bi-weeklies. Of these 223 newspapers, 50 dailies and 183 weeklies are published in Urdu, while 67 are published in Bengali, the other State language.²

From the above statement it will be clear that the Press has been the handmaid of the Muslim awakening in India and Pakistan, of which the Aligarh Movement was the progenitor. No 'movement' or organization can long exist without its 'official organ'. Sir Syed set the example by establishing his own Press at Ghazipur in 1863 in connection with his Scientific Society, and by issuing from Aligarh, on his return from England in 1870, the well-known Tahdhib-ul-Aklāq (Social Reformer). Since that time the Muslim Press in India and Pakistan has developed a ceaseless and ever-increasing activity.

The Press covers every phase of activity and thought among Muslims, and admirably serves their needs. The publications may be classed as follows: the political group, which is by far the largest of all; the religious journals which serve the different sects, including propaganda publications, especially those of the Ahmadiyah persuasion; the literary group; the social reform group; the women's and children's group, and the scientific group. These publications include dailies, weeklies, monthlies and quarterlies. Lahore, Karachi and Dacca are the centres from which the most important Pakistan Muslim journals emanate. In India the chief Muslim publication centres are Delhi, Lucknow, Calcutta, Bombay and Hyderabad.

¹ The Indian Year Book, 1928, p. 606, Times Press, Bombay.

² Notes on Islam, Calcutta, 1955.

There are many evidences that the Muslim Press in Pakistan and India is endeavouring to keep pace with the times in which we live. On the whole it is progressive and forward-looking. The rapidly changing world, and the pressure of necessity have developed a modern and progressive editorial outlook. The mullā mind is gradually becoming less and less influential with the public, in spite of the efforts of certain reactionary leaders in recent years. Reform movements which have transformed Turkey in the last four decades, and more recent movements affecting Indonesia, Egypt and North Africa have all compelled the editors to remain wide awake.

Finally, the Muslim Press is avowedly religious, following the consistent Muslim pattern. A wholly secular paper or magazine can scarcely be found. After all, this but reflects the remarkable genius of Islam in that it not only claims to dominate, but succeeds in dominating, all aspects of Muslim life. It is but natural, therefore, that the subject which overshadows all others in editorial thinking in the Muslim Press of India and Pakistan is one only. It is ISLAM.

CONCLUSION

The last century has seen a revolution in Islamic thought and life in the India-Pakistan area which very faithfully corresponds to the influences and transformations which have been at work simultaneously throughout the whole Muslim world. Stirred at first by resentment at the total collapse of Muslim rule in India and the rise of a foreign Christian power in its place, there was a strongly reactionary movement of puritanical Wahhabism. This, for a time, threatened to block all progress and keep the Muslim community locked behind doors of ignorance and medievalism. Then came the awakening, brought about by the leadership of men who had the prophetic vision of the new day which modern science had ushered into the world. It is safe to say that the Muslim communities of India and Pakistan today owe their greatest debt of gratitude to that stalwart 'apostle of reconciliation', Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, which they will never be fully able to repay . . . except by carrying to a fuller development in both India and Pakistan the plans and ideals which he cherished, when he laid the foundations of the University at Aligarh more than three-quarters of a century ago. Indeed it may be truly said that Sir Syed unknowingly began the movement which Quaid-i-Azam Muhammad Ali Jinnah so gloriously brought to its destined goal in PAKISTAN !

CHAPTER XI

THE NEW MUSLIM APOLOGETIC AND POLEMIC

In no phase of Muslim life in India and Pakistan has contact with the West produced a more marked change than in the realm of religious thought. Some attention has already been paid to this ; but we have still to consider it in detail, and to show what the new Muslim apologetic and polemic are. In the first place, it may be said that the change consists in a new attitude of mind rather than in a new system of thought. This changed attitude has been conditioned entirely by modern scientific, social, and economic influences. It has arisen out of the force of circumstances which were clearly threatening Islam not only from without but from within. The prophets of the movement have all along seen that Islam could not be modernized in any secular fashion without serious danger that its modernized adherents would abandon the faith, unless it could likewise be rationalized in keeping with the discoveries of modern scientific truth and modern social requirements. They had come to see that Islam, as understood and expounded by the orthodox formalists, would not long continue to have an appeal for a Muslim with a university degree. The time had arrived for a break, not with Islam itself, but with its traditionalist exponents, 'who have degraded the religion by paying undue attention to formulas and forms, to the exclusion and neglect of its living spirit and reality.'¹ In addition, two other reasons may be mentioned which have stirred men to produce a new apologetic—one being the need to defend Islam against the criticisms of modern Hindu and Christian writers, and the other a desire to make Islam attractive to non-Muslims, particularly to Christians of western countries.

ATTEMPTS AT A RATIONALISTIC INTERPRETATION OF ISLAM

The 'modernists', who have laboured with great pains to give what they call a scientific interpretation of Islam, belong to a school of thought that has been variously designated as Necharī (i.e. according to Nature) and neo-Mu'tazilite. The first name was given because of the extensive use made of the term 'nature' by Sir Syed Aḥmad Khāṇ and his successors, in their attempt to show that Islam, rightly understood, is, of all the religions of the world, the most in accord with the nature of man, and Nature in the scientific sense. The second term is used by certain persons to describe the followers of the movement, as they resemble a group of rationalistic Islamic theologians of the eighth century A.D., called Mu'tazilites, who revolted against the current orthodox teachings of their day.

¹ Sir Ahmad Hussain, Notes on Islam, 12.

The problem that confronted the pioneers in this modernist movement was a perplexing one indeed. Sir Syed Aḥmad Khāṇ, who was among the first to move in this, as in all other directions of reform, was a stout defender of the faith as it had been delivered to Muḥammad and his companions. All his reading and contacts with the west had never for a moment shaken his belief in the fundamental truth of Islam. Nevertheless, he was convinced that a radical reform in theology was as necessary as in education and society. So he began by preaching and writing in favour of a return to Muḥammad and the Qur'ān for a new interpretation, and setting forth the first principles of the religion of Islam. This, in fact, is the plea of all the modernists. They all agree that the 'Islam of Muḥammad', the 'Islam of the Qur'ān', is without blemish and without spot, and that 'its genuine and chief principles are in perfect harmony' with Nature and reason.

Further, they maintain that Islam is not only the most rational religion, but it is the universal religion that was proclaimed by all the prophets of mankind, and, as such, is offered to all men everywhere. In fact, the belief is often expressed that, in accordance with the Qur'ānic text, all nations have had their prophets and have been given divine revelations in sacred books; and, on this assumption, it is not considered improper to speak of the Hindu incarnations, Rām and Krishna, as among the prophets, and to pray for God's peace upon them when mentioning them.¹

¹ 'Ināyat Allāh Khāṇ, Tadhkirah, I, Dībāchah, 63.

Others are inclined to go still further, and say that Islam is but one of many true religions in the world, and 'observe that most Muhammadans of to-day have forgotten this principle, and have therefore become intolerant fanatics'.¹ This writer goes on to say that he would not object to calling all who believe in one God Muslims, whether they be Jews, Christians or theistic Hindus, but only those are Mu'mins (believers in the Islamic sense) who believe that Muhammad is the messenger of God.² Finally, he insists that there is :

No inherent antagonism between Christianity and Islam, if and when the sayings and doings of the founders of each are rightly viewed and understood in a simple and natural manner. Muhammad never ceased saying that he had come to attest and complete the mission of Jesus and His predecessors, who were God's messengers like himself. The greatest and the best rule of human conduct which Jesus laid down was, 'Love thy neighbour as thyself'. This is quite consistent with human nature, and is the most comprehensive rule of conduct which has ever been laid down for the guidance of mankind. To my mind, there is no better proof of the identity in spirit of Christianity and Islam than the confirmation of Christ's command by Muhammad himself. 'No one will be a faithful Muslim until he loves his neighbour as he loves himself.' For this reason, I believe that there is no difference between the two religions, if the metaphysical doctrines engrafted on both be eliminated. Thus Islam is but true Christianity writ short. Both recognize that the source of virtue is love.³

The Rt. Hon. Syed Amīr 'Alī also sums up his position by saying that, except for the conception of the divine sonship of Jesus, no fundamental difference exists between Christianity and Islam.⁴

THE NEW EMPHASIS ON MUHAMMAD

A new emphasis is being placed to-day on the character of the Prophet of Islam, and a process of idealization is going on which represents him as the perfect model for mankind (insān-ul-kāmil). This is not only at variance with the historical 'lives', such as that of Ibn Hishām, but even to the express statements of Muhammad himself as set forth in the Qur'ān, where he asks forgiveness for his own sins.

¹ Sir Ahmad Hussain, Notes on Islam, 30.

² Ibid., 32.

³ Ibid., 84.

⁴ Syed Amīr 'Alī, The Life and Teachings of Muhammad, 282.

The whole purpose of this new effort would seem to be to offset the character of the 'sinless Christ of Christianity', as well as to arouse a new enthusiasm for Islam by recognizing that religion thrives best when it can lay claim to a person in whom centre all the highest spiritual and moral values, and around whom loyal followers can rally. In the new apologetic it is no longer the Qur'ān and the Shari'at (the Law) to which men are called, but to Muḥammad himself.

The Prophet is pictured as tender-hearted, and as abolishing the atrocities of War. He was gentle and merciful even to his greatest enemies. In him were combined the highest attributes that the human mind can conceive: justice and mercy.¹ Muḥammad was believed in by his wife and nearest relatives, on the other hand, Jesus' brothers never believed in Him, and even His immediate disciples were not firm in their belief;² also, his preaching was equal to that of Isaiah or Jesus.³ If Jesus had a triumphal entry, so did Muḥammad. 'Thus at length', says Syed Amīr 'Alī, 'Muḥammad entered Mecca as a conqueror. He who was a fugitive and persecuted now came to prove his mission by deeds of mercy. The city which had treated him so cruelly, driven him and his faithful band for refuge amongst strangers, which had sworn to take his life and the lives of his devoted disciples, lay at his feet. His old persecutors, relentless and ruthless, who had disgraced humanity by inflicting cruel outrages upon the inoffensive men and women, even upon the lifeless dead, were now completely at his mercy. But in the hour of triumph every evil suffered was forgotten, every injury inflicted was forgiven, and a general amnesty was extended to the population of Mecca. Only four criminals, "whom justice condemned", made up Muḥammad's proscription list when he entered as a conqueror the city of his bitterest enemies. The army followed his example, and entered gently and peaceably; no house was robbed, no woman insulted. Most truly has it been said that, through all the annals of conquest, there has been no triumphant entry like this one.'⁴

Syed Amīr 'Alī, The Spirit of Islam, 158, 178. London, 1891.

¹ Ibid., 96.

² Ibid., 254.

⁴ Ibid., 192, 193.

Furthermore, Muhammad is considered superior to Jesus because he offered no materialistic miracles to prove his mission.

Whereas the disciples of Jesus, with their materialistic scepticism, were always asking for miracles, it must be said to the credit of the disciples of the Arabian teacher that they never called for a miracle from their Master. They looked rather for the moral evidences of his mission.¹

Still another proof of this superiority of Muhammad is found in the fact that he was more practical than Jesus. Jesus' teaching was too visionary and idealistic, and so far above the natural instincts and moral and spiritual possibilities in man that it was doomed to failure; on the other hand, 'in Islam is joined a lofty idealism with the most rationalistic practicality, . . . which does not ignore human nature'.² Jesus gave no systematic teaching to the world and did not bring His work to completion. Muhammad did both. The systematic teachings and ritual in Islam are a mark of superiority, the absence of which in Christianity, as given by Jesus, is a defect. Muhammad came to finish the work which Jesus left unsystematized. 'Jesus produced no visible effect on the Jews to whom He came; but it was reserved for Muhammad to fulfil his mission and that of his predecessors.'³ In this connexion, also, it is alleged that Jesus' mission was national, and only to the 'lost sheep of the house of Israel', while Muhammad's mission was to all the world.⁴ In short, Muhammad's life is regarded as incomparable in respect of its purity and truth.⁵

A large share of the new apologetic and polemic is concerned, too, with the justification or rationalistic explanation of some of the teachings of Islam, which, in the light of modern developments, seemed to demand a new interpretation. Among these the most important are the following.

THE DOCTRINE OF ABRIGATION

It is commonly held that the doctrine of Nāsikh and Man-sūkh (the abrogator and the abrogated) is applied to the

¹ Ibid., 102, 103.

² Ibid., 278.

³ Ibid., 273, 19, 211.

⁴ See Muhammad 'Alī, Muhammad or Christ.

⁵ Syed Amīr 'Alī, op. cit., 219, 221.

abrogation of former scriptures by the Qur'ān, and to the abrogation of one verse of the Qur'ān by a verse that was revealed later. The modern apologist for Islam takes the position so well expressed by Sir Syed Aḥmad Khān, who says :

It is a religious duty of Muḥammadans to believe that God is omniscient—that is, that He has a perfect knowledge of all that is past, present and to come ; therefore were we to understand by Nāsikh and Mansūkh that God, for some cause or other, cancelled a former Revelation by a later one, we should be implying that, at the time of the first Revelation, God had lost His power of omniscience, which opinion, according to Islam, savours of infidelity . . . (therefore) these expressions are not applied by Muḥammadan divines to the loss of preceding prophets.

Nor do they apply to the Qur'ān in the sense in which they are often taken.

There are to be found in the Qur'ān, and in the sayings of the Prophet, commandments relating to one and the same matter, but under different circumstances ; and when one of those circumstances no longer remains the commandment relating thereto does not remain in force, while the commandment which is intended to meet the altered circumstance then comes into operation ; the former commandment being called Mansūkh (the cancelled), and the subsequent one Nāsikh (the canceller). This, however, by no means implies that the former commandment was in any way defective, but that, the circumstance to which it was applicable has ceased to exist, and consequently that the commandment itself ceases to be in force ; but that, should the same circumstance again present itself the same commandment will again come into operation, and that the one which was subsequent to it will then, in its turn, cease.¹

ISLAM A RELIGION OF PEACE

Islam is presented as the religion of peace, toleration, charity, and brotherhood. The verse most often quoted in support of this position is, ' Let there be no compulsion in religion '.² Proselytism by the sword is held by some to be wholly contrary to the instincts of Muhammad ; nor did Islam consecrate slavery, but rather proclaimed the natural equality of all human beings.³

¹ Sir Syed Aḥmad Khān, Essays on the Life of Muḥammad, On the Qur'ān, 19ff.

² Sūrah, II, 257.

³ Syed Amīr 'Alī, op. cit., 306, 379.

ISLAM AND WOMAN

One of the frequent assertions made by those who seek to justify the position of woman in Islam is that she occupies a place far superior to that in any other religion. It is held, also, that the teaching of the Qur'ān in respect of polygamy is to be justified on the grounds that it is a rational attempt to meet the needs of human society, which outside Islamic circles is met by more or less legalized forms of prostitution. As opposed to this, others with more advanced views frankly admit that 'polygamy in the present day is an adulterous connexion, and is contrary to the Spirit of Islam—an opinion which is shared by a large number of Moslems'.¹ Nevertheless, they are faced with the fact that provision for polygamy occurs in the Qur'ān. But in reference to this it has become common to point out that the essential teaching of the Qur'ān is monogamous, for, while the law permits a man to take four wives, it is strictly on the condition that he can deal justly with all of them. Since it is a practical impossibility to deal fairly with four at one time, it must be assumed that the essential meaning of the Qur'an is that a man should have but one wife. But there are others who view the position of woman in Islam with considerable concern, and it is through such bold and fearless souls that the way seems to be opening up for extended reforms, and the real improvement of Islamic society. Prof. Khudā Bakhsh takes contemporary reformers to task, and makes them face the facts. Criticizing the shallowness of the 'moderate' position, he says in all fearlessness :

The author of Reforms under Muslim Rule seeks to make out that polygamy is an institution which Islam does not sanction, but I am not quite sure that he is right. At all events, the unanimity and concensus of opinions is the other way. It may, with growth of education and freedom of women, die out, but the question which we must decide, and that once for all, is whether it is an institution compatible with present-day notions. Is this institution to be retained or done away with? Is it conducive to the interests of society, or otherwise? If the general sense of the Muḥammadan world condemns it as pernicious to the stability, happiness, comfort and peace of the family, let it be expunged from our law. If it approves it, retain it by all means. I do not believe in the argument, constantly put forward, that the conditions which the Qur'ān imposes upon its practice are too difficult of realization, and as such, according to the strict letter of the law, the practice cannot be supported or sustained. But this is no answer to the question raised here. Is the institution per se good or bad? Is it beneficial to the interest, or subversive of the well-being, of society? There can be no two opinions on this point. To our mind, the social corruption behind the zenana is to a large extent due to this system.¹

¹ Ibid., 365. S. Khudā Bakhsh, Essays, Indian and Islamic, 253ff.

The above writer deals no less firmly with the problem of Islamic divorce, and joins hands with Sir Muḥammad Iqbāl in demanding a radical change in the treatment of women in this respect. With a sense of inward shame he declares, 'In eastern Bengal divorce is the order of the day, and wives are put away as we cast off our old clothes. . . . No judicial inquiry, no positive proof, not a tittle of evidence of any sort is needed. The lord of creation is invested with the power of divorce, and he makes full and free use of it.'² Dr. Iqbāl at the same time asserts that the only way in which a woman can get rid of a scapegrace of a husband is by becoming an apostate.³

All of this comes perilously near to throwing away the Qur'ān as a guide for social legislation. Though there may be but few who would follow him all the way, still it is worth while for us to consider again the words of Prof. Khudā Bakhsh on this subject, for he is one of a small but ever-growing group of Muslims who are hopefully trying to find their way out of the present social-religious entanglement of their community. This keen student writes :

With all our reverence and devotion to our religion, we do not believe that the moral and other laws are to be learned by experience and observation, but solely by the study of the Qur'ān and the practice of the Prophet. This view I hold to be utterly unsupported by our religion. . . . and that it is a wholly unfounded doctrine, without any religious basis or sanction for it.¹

¹ Ibid., 256.

² Ibid., 258.

³ It should be noted, however, that there is a permissible form of divorce which the wife may take advantage of, known as khul'. A Muslim magistrate friend of mine gives his opinion regarding the subject of divorce as follows : 'The defect at present lies in the prevalent code of civil laws, where the provisions for khul' has not been kept up. Also, if the proper restrictions were imposed, as laid down by the Law of Islam, viz. if the dowry (mahr) were really given to the woman, or vice versa, if the responsibility to support a pregnant divorced wife and the issue were enforced, and if the right of the issue to inherit property were recognized, as they should be where true Islamic conditions prevail, then the number of divorces would come down very low.'

He goes on to plead for full freedom of thought, and for a modern use of the Qur'ān as a source of inspiration and as a devotional manual.

THE IDEALISM OF IQBAL

The most inspiring of all the modernists in Indian Islam was the poet-philosopher Sir Muhammad Iqbāl (1873-1938), who delivered a message to his co-religionists that produced a profound impression. In his writings, notably the Asrār-i-khudi (Secrets of the Self), he sought to combine in unique fashion the teaching of the Qur'ān with the philosophies of Bergson and Nietzsche. The keynote of his philosophy is the development of personality, which he asserts can best be realized by 'going back to the Qur'ān'. With bitter scorn he denounces the inactivity and aloofness from the world of the Sufi saints and mystics. His Ideal Man will not be absorbed in God, but will himself overcome the world, and absorb the qualities of God, and so save mankind. The Prophet of Islam was one whose radiance of soul exceeded all poetic fancies, for he it was who succeeded in transforming the whole world by the sublimity of his ideals. By thus setting forth the possibility of individual regeneration, and the development of the highest type of personality, by means of the exercise of will and the fulfilling of man's highest possibilities, as revealed in the Qur'ān and by the Prophet Muḥammad, Iqbāl made a powerful appeal to the younger generation of Muslims, who see in him one of the worthiest successors of the revered Sir Syed Aḥmad Khān. In fact Iqbāl was the seer and prophet who first glimpsed PAKISTAN !

In 1928-29 Iqbāl delivered six lectures at Madras and elsewhere in India, and at Oxford University. These attracted wide attention, and were published with the title, Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam. Certain observations on these lectures and the evaluation of the effective influence of Iqbāl on the Muslim community are so pertinent as given by Dr. Wilfred C. Smith in his book, *Modern Islam in India*¹ I shall quote them as follows:

¹ S. Khuda Bakhsh, op. cit., 281.

Muhammad Iqbal summoned the sleeping Muslims to awake . . . Throughout his life he devoted himself to inciting activity, to insisting eloquently that life is movement, that action is good, that the universe is composed of processes and not static things. He bitterly attacked the attitudes of resignation and quiet contentment, the religious valuation of contemplation, passivity and withdrawal from strife . . . Iqbāl's prime function was to lash men into furious activity, and to imbue the idle onlooker with restless impatience. Life is not to be contemplated, but to be passionately lived.

This call to impatient initiative is the chief revolution wrought by Iqbal in Islamic thought. It is a necessary revolution, if Islam is to survive. For modern thinking must be dynamic, modern ethics must be positive and creative . . .

The greatest service rendered by Iqbal was his reiterated call to action in the name of Islam, his raising of action to be a virtue itself, his bold insistence that a dynamic infidel is more righteous than a passive Muslim :

'A kāfir before his idol with wakeful heart

Is better than the religious man asleep in the haram.'

He condemned the formalism of the pious, and despised those who rate observance of a code above the creative love and energy :

'I have ascertained none of the ins and outs of the Law

But this : that who denies love and passion is kāfir and atheist.'

Thus Iqbal has come a long way from the accepted Islamic moral attitude. In his view, the goal of humanity is not submission but supremacy. The chief end of man is to be the Vicegerent of God on Earth.

Theologically, although Iqbal was no theologian, he wrought the most important and the most necessary revolution in modern times. For he made God immanent, not transcendent. For Islam, this is rank heresy ; but for today it is the only salvation . . . Iqbāl's God is in the world, now, with us, facing our problems from within, creating a new and better world with us and through us Religion is life.

THE MODERNISTS AND HIGHER CRITICISM OF THE QUR'ĀN

In the foregoing analysis of the modern apologetic for Islam which has been attempted, it will strike the critical observer as curious that we have made no mention of any disposition on the part of Muslims themselves to undertake the difficult task of higher criticism of the Qur'ān or to make an inquiry into the vexed question of revelation and the authority of the Prophet Muḥammad. When Sir Syed Aḥmad Khān, with his liberal views on religion, began to make his investigations in Qur'ānic and Biblical studies, it was thought that possibly a new day had dawned, and that Indian Muslims themselves would seriously undertake the historical and scientific criticism of the bases of their religion. But nothing of any consequence developed. It is true that Prof. Khudā Bakhsh freely admits the debt of Islam to Christianity, Judaism, and Pre-Islamic Arabia, and he holds that Islam was thus developed by Muḥammad into an eclectic system. Syed Amīr 'Alī makes bold to state that the Qur'ān is the product of the mind of Muḥammad, and reflects the processes of development of his religious consciousness.¹ Another of like mind, in speaking of the Qur'ān, calls it 'a collection of sermons, commands and instructions, delivered and issued from time to time as occasion required . . . and you have to interpret the Qur'ān quite naturally as any other book or historic document.'² But for the most part the modernists leave the question of revelation (wahy) and the authority of the Prophet strictly alone, and take it that these are beyond the scope or necessity of legitimate criticism and investigation. Sir Syed Aḥmad Khān frankly admits that he considers the orthodox position in regard to the revelation of the Qur'ān and the authority of Muḥammad perfectly sound and according to Nature and Reason. Finally, Maulvī Muḥammad 'Alī, of Lahore who brought out such an elaborate commentary on the Qur'ān in English, fails to face these questions squarely, in spite of the fact that he claims to be thoroughly modern and scientific in his scholastic labours.³

¹ Wilfred C. Smith, Modern Islam in India, Minerva Press, Lahore, 1943, pp. 115-118.

The truth is that, while the investigators of religious truth among Muslims may be perfectly sincere in their endeavours to make their investigations with an impartial mind, they have as yet been unable wholly to throw off the psychological bias in favour of certain views, and to approach the subject from a purely scientific view-point. The result is that, however much they may try to avoid doing so, they give the impression that their conclusions have been reached before the investigation was made. So, in the end, the writings of all lead to the conclusion expressed by Syed Amīr 'Alī, that

¹ The Spirit of Islam, 398, 399, Syed amir Ali, London, 1891.

² Sir Ahmad Hussain, op. cit., 39, 83.

³ Maulvi Muhammad 'Ali, Translation of the Holy Qur'ān, Lahore, 1920. 940, 941.

The Islam of Muhammad contains nothing which in itself bars the progress of the intellectual development of humanity. The wonderful adaptability of the Islamic precepts to all ages and nations; their entire concordance with the light of reason; the absence of all mysterious doctrines to cast a shade of sentimental ignorance round the primal truths implanted in the human breast—all prove that Islam represents the latest development of the religious faculties of our being.¹

This, then, is the end of the matter, and since this conclusion represents the sound and reasoned judgment of the learned leaders of Islam in India and Pakistan there is nothing more to be said; and, for the Muslim, doubts and questionings are altogether out of place.

THE AḤMADĪYAH MOVEMENT

Along with the development of these intellectual and rationalizing tendencies in the Muslim community, a wholly new sect has arisen, which centres around the person and teaching of Mirzā Ghulām Aḥmad.² The 'movement' represents a reaction to the naturalistic interpretations of Islam as set forth by the Aligarh reformers, while at the same time repudiating the authority of the orthodox mullā. Over against the claims of both, Mirzā sets his own personal claims to be the correct interpreter of Islam for the present age, to which he brings a new message. It is this 'message' of Aḥmad and his followers that constitutes a very distinct contribution to the new Muslim apologetic and polemic which we are now considering, since the Aḥmadīs are at present the most active propagandists of Islam in the world.

The founder of the Aḥmadiyah Movement,³ Mirzā Ghulam Aḥmad, was born in Quadian, a small town of the

¹ The Spirit of Islam, 639, 275.

² For a careful study of the movement see The Ahmadiya Movement, H. A. Walter, Association Press, Calcutta, 1918.

³ Also see The People of the Mosque, L. Bevan Jones, Association Press, Calcutta, pp. 218-238.

East Punjab in the year 1839. He belonged to a respectable Mughul family, which traces its migration into India from the time of Bābur, in the sixteenth century. He received a good education in Muslim language and sciences, and some time before the year 1880, he evidently came to the conclusion that he was called to undertake a special divine mission. However, it was not until 1889 that he announced that he had been the recipient of a divine revelation, which made it lawful for him formally to initiate followers or disciples. From this time onward he began to formulate and declare his new doctrines with a boldness and determination that brooked no opposition.

Aḥmad sought to base his claims on the Muslim prophecies concerning the appearance of the Messiah and the Imām Mahdī, whom Muslims look for at the approach of the last day. The Jews still look for the coming of the Messiah and Christians and Muslims anticipate His second coming. Further, he maintained that the scriptures of the Zoroastrians, the Hindus, and Buddhists, all prophesied the coming of a great World Teacher. So Aḥmad began to declare himself as the one in whom the hopes of all peoples and nations were to be fulfilled. Further, he insisted that, in keeping with the Islamic tradition that God is supposed to send a special individual to be a 'renewer' (mujaddid) to restore the faith of Islam at the beginning of each century, Mirzā Ghulām Aḥmad had all the divine marks of being the mujaddid for the fourteenth century of the Islamic era.

The arguments advanced to support these unique claims, together with the interpretation thereof, are set forth in voluminous writings by the Promised Messiah himself, as well as by certain of his followers. Since his chief emphasis is placed on the fact of his being the Promised Messiah, we shall first consider this aspect of his teaching.

THE PROMISED MESSIAH

According to his calculations, six millenniums have elapsed since the birth of Adam, and at the beginning of the seventh millennium it has been prophesied God would raise up a man in the likeness of Adam who would be called Messiah. 'The Promises of God, therefore, make it absolutely necessary that the second Adam must have been born already, though not recognized as yet by the world.' Further, he was convinced that he must be the Messiah of prophecy, since this second Adam must appear in the East, and thus he resembled the first in respect of his locality.¹ Also, 'earthquakes, plague, famine, wars, and terrestrial as well as heavenly phenomena, bear witness to the one fact that there is to be no more waiting for the Messiah's advent'.² Among these signs which bore witness to his claim were a solar and lunar eclipse, which occurred in the month of Ramaḍān, 1894, corruption of Muslim mullās, the neglect of the Qur'ān and, the splitting of Islam into sects.

Having thus satisfied himself that the outward conditions of prophecy were fulfilled for the appearance of the Promised Messiah, it became necessary to explain in what sense he could lay claim to that high distinction. Here he fell back on divine revelation, on which, in fact, he rested his whole claim as a 'messenger of the latter days'. Thus he asserted that he had not come in the person of Jesus, but only in His 'spirit and power'. To make good this assertion, it became necessary to attack the doctrine current among Muslims, as well as Christians, that Jesus Himself would return as the Messiah. This belief must be set aside; otherwise his claim to Messiahship would be presumptuous. The whole question turned on the post-mortem existence of Jesus. Aḥmad set out to prove that Jesus did not die on the cross, though, contrary to the Qur'ānic text, he admitted He was crucified. He held that He merely swooned away, and that His wounds were completely healed, after He was taken down from the cross, by the application of the marham-i-'Isā (the Jesus ointment), the ingredients of which were divinely revealed to the disciples; which preparation is being sold to-day by the followers of Aḥmad. After forty days' sojourn with the disciples, Jesus came to Afghānistān and Kashmir on a mission to their inhabitants, whom Aḥmad claims are the ten lost tribes of Israel.³

Aḥmad sought to prove that Jesus died a natural death and was buried in Kashmir. In support of his contention, ¹ Review of Religions, I, 15.

² Ibid., III, 397.

³ H. A. Walter, The Aḥmadiya-Movement, 90 f., op. cit., 256.

he claims to have discovered His grave. The tomb which Aḥmad's followers assert is the grave of Jesus is to be found in Khān Yār Street, Srinagar, Kashmir, and bears the inscription of one Yūs Āṣaf, who is worshipped as a Muslim saint. In fact, it is more than probable that the tomb is not even that of a Muslim, but is only a shrine of Buddhist origin. Nevertheless, from the name alone, he made his deductions to suit his case. Yūs was a corruption of Yasū', the Arabic name of Jesus, and Āṣaf he took to be the same as the Hebrew asaf, which signifies gathering, which he insisted referred to Jesus' mission as 'Gatherer' of the ten lost tribes. The ascended Jesus of the Muslims and Christians being thus set aside through the 'proof' of His natural death, and the 'discovery' of His last resting-place, the one great obstacle to the justifying of his new doctrine of the appearance of the Māhdī-Messiah, messenger of the latter days, was cleared away, for it was obvious that a dead Messiah could not possibly come with power from on high.¹

THE MAHDĪ

The Aḥmadiyah conception of the Māhdī doctrine of Islam is as unique as that of the Messiah; and, like the former, is based on the underlying assumption that all such appearances, prophesied in all religions whatsoever, are but manifestations of God's power to raise up 'Renewers' of religion from age to age, and that He has not left any nation without a prophet. This Aḥmad was constantly asserting. He took the view that the references in the Qur'ān to prophecies to the coming of the Messiah, the Prophet, and the Māhdī all referred to the same person, and that he was the person in whom all converged. As Promised Messiah he claimed to come in the 'spirit and power of Jesus', and that in a spiritual sense he and Jesus were one; so in the capacity of Māhdī he regarded himself as 'the second advent of our Lord Muḥammad', and as 'an image of the Holy Prophet'. But the Māhdī of orthodox Islam is to be a man of war whose path is red with the blood of unbelievers, while Aḥmad was a man of peace. So he declared that 'under existing circumstances' the only jihād (holy war) allowable was spiritual, he advocated the utmost loyalty to the British Government, and refused to support the political policies of the All-India Muslim League.

¹ Ibid., 93 ff.

THE WORLD MESSENGER OF THE LATTER DAYS

To be a messenger for all the world, and to fulfil the prophecy of the coming of a great World Teacher who should unite people of all faiths and countries, it was necessary to seek refuge in further revelation, which he said was given to him as follows :

He has told me, not on one occasion but repeatedly, that so I am Kṛishṇa for the Hindus and the Promised Messiah for the Muhammadans and the Christians . . . this is a revelation from God which I cannot but announce, and this is the first day that I announce this claim in such a large gathering, for those who come from God do not fear being blamed or reviled. Now Rājā Kṛishṇa was revealed to me as so great and perfect a man that his equal is not to be found among the Hindu rishis and avatārs. . . Spiritually Kṛishṇa and the Promised Messiah are one and the same person, there being no difference except that which exists in the terminology of the two people, Hindu and Muhammadan.¹

To-day his followers regard him as ' the Messenger for all nations ', and the fulfilment of all ancient prophecies.²

REFORMER OR PROPHET

In addition to the usual terminology employed by Aḥmad to designate his mission as Mahdī-Messiah, further interpretation of his nature and functions are set forth in the fifth and last two articles of the Creed of the Aḥmadī community³ as follows :

The door of inspiration has always been, and will always be, open, and no attribute of God ever became useless. As He used to hold communion with His good servants, so He does even now, and will continue to do upto the end of the world.

It is on this belief that Aḥmad rests his claim to having been the recipient of divine revelation, which is clearly understood by him as ilhām (inspiration or subjective revelation),

¹ Review of Religions, III, 411.

² The Holy Qur'ān, English tr., Quadian, 1915, pt. 1 (B).

³ Condition of Bay'at, a pamphlet published by the Aḥmadī Community, Quadian, setting forth the conditions of membership, for he seems to have made no claim to having received revelation in the Qur'ānic sense of wahy, or objective revelation, such as that by which the Qur'ān was held to have been revealed to Muḥammad. Nevertheless, he regarded the revelations he received through ilhām as having real and objective validity, on which he sought to base his whole claim to being the manifestation (burūz) of both the spirit and power of Jesus, Muḥammad, Kṛishṇa, and, in short, of the divine spirit.

To continue the quotation :

We believe among his (Muhammad's) followers reformers (mujaddid) have appeared, and will continue to appear, with spiritual knowledge of a very high order. Not only this, but a man can even gain prophethood by the help of our Lord Muhammad's spiritual powers. But no prophet with a new book, or having been appointed direct, will ever come; for in this case it would be an insult to the perfect prophethood of our Lord, and this is the meaning of the seal of the prophets, and in this sense the Lord has, on the one hand, said, 'There is no prophet (i.e. an independent prophet or prophet with a new law) after me', and, on the other hand, has called the coming Messiah a prophet (nabi) of God.

According to this we believe that a man, the Promised Messiah, has gained prophethood in spite of his being a follower of our Lord. . . .

In the above articles of faith is set forth not only the grounds for accepting Ahmad as a reformer, but even in some sense as a prophet. He is regarded as standing in the same relation to Muḥammad as Jesus did to Moses, and, as Jesus brought the Mosaic dispensation to a close, 'similarly the Muḥammadan dispensation has been consummated in the person of Mirzā Ghulām Ahmad of Qadian'.¹ He not only claimed that God supported his mission with evidentiary miracles, as in the case of former prophets, but he plainly asserted his superiority to Jesus, whom, of course, he regarded as one of the prophets. The claim to prophethood ultimately came to be a cause of division in the ranks after the founder's death, one party regarding him only as a mujaddid (reformer), but the other still asserting that his character and mission were in some sense those of a prophet.

¹ The Holy Qur'ān, tr., Qadian, 1915, pt., I, 35.

RELATION OF THE MOVEMENT TO ORTHODOX ISLAM

The movement initiated by Mirzā Ghulām Aḥmad occupies a unique position, in relation to both the orthodox party and the rationalistic reformers represented by Sir Syed Aḥmad Khān and his neo-Mu'tazilite followers. Aḥmad himself declaimed bitterly against the professional mullas of Islam, who kept the people in darkness, who had allowed Islam to die of formalism, who had not prevented the division into sects. He deplored the popular worship of saints, and set himself as a true reformer to restore the true and unpolluted faith of Islam to the followers of the prophet. At the same time, he could not tolerate the rationalizing expositors of Islam, such as Syed Amīr 'Alī and Prof. S. Khudā Bakḥsh, who were beginning to throw doubt on the Qur'ān, as a perfect work of divine revelation, in tracing some of the sources of Islam to pre-Islamic Arabia, Judaism, and even to Christianity. In regard to social reform, Aḥmad stood by the conservatives. He repudiated the abolition of purdah, and staunchly defended the Islamic law of divorce and polygamy, 'spurning any attempt within Islam to adapt Muḥammad's teaching and practice to present day customs in Christian lands'.¹ He frankly regarded Islam as the only religion 'which not only claims to be free from every error and falsehood, but also offers proof of this freedom from error'.²

Aḥmad and his followers earned the bitter enmity of the orthodox party, following such severe denunciation of the very people whom he had come to reform. He was branded a heretic, a blasphemer, and an enemy of the faith, as well as an impostor. Naturally, he was excommunicated, and from that time on he and his followers were forbidden the use of the ordinary mosques. Thenceforth he ordered his followers to pray under the leadership of Aḥmadī Imāms only, and where there were no Aḥmadī Imāms they should offer their prayers alone. No less than four Aḥmadī missionaries have suffered the penalty of death for heresy in the Muslim country of Afghānistān, the last two being in 1924, at which time the uncompromising attitude of the orthodox Muslims of

¹ H. A. Walter, The Aḥmadiya Movement, 68. assoc. Press, Calcutta, 1918.

² Review of Religions, III, 29.

India to the Aḥmadīs was shown by the fact that their leaders sent telegrams to the Amīr at Kabul expressing their approval of the measure he had taken in the interest of the faith.¹

THE POLEMIC

The Aḥmadī writers and preachers, from the time of Aḥmad down to the present, have distinguished themselves among Muslims by the virulence and vigour of the attack which they have made on the credibility of the Bible, the person of Jesus Christ, and the Christian Church. As this polemic is not only one of the most important, but one of the most interesting parts of the propaganda carried on by the Anjuman, it is necessary to give it some attention. In following up this point, it should be noted that extensive use has been made of the works of the 'higher critics' of certain extreme schools of thought in Germany and England; and that, without regard to actual historical values, selection of the authorities has been made solely to suit the purpose in hand, and the conclusions reached are always represented as the concensus of opinion of the best Christian scholarship of the day! This is the method par excellence used by Maulvī Muḥammad 'Alī in his book, Muḥammad or Christ, and by Kḥwājah Kamāl-ud-Dīn in his Sources of Christianity.

AGAINST THE BIBLE

As over against the Qur'ān which is asserted to have been preserved from change by the miraculous protection of God, the Bible is held to be full of interpolations; and the Qur'ān, instead of confirming it, offers clear refutations of certain matters contained in the Christian scriptures. As, for instance,

That the blind and leprous are impure; that Solomon was an idolater; that David became a prey to temptations; that Aaron joined in the worship of the calf out of fear of his people; that Jesus is the Son of God; that one person can bear the sins of others; that the law is a curse; that God feels tired or repentant; that He chose the Israelites for His special favours. In fact, there is quite a large number of beliefs and teachings in the Bible which the holy Qur'ān refutes by giving powerful arguments against them, and declares forcibly as being not revelations from God, but interpolations of man. In the face of such a forcible condemnation of a large number of Biblical doctrines, it is preposterous to think that the holy Qur'ān confirms the Bible, as it is before us to-day.¹

¹ The Muslim Outlook, Lahore, September 24, 1914.

AGAINST JESUS CHRIST

The virgin birth is attacked in subtle fashion. No categorical denial is offered, but such statements as these: that Adam had neither father nor mother, that thousands of worms are brought into existence without any father, and that learned physicians of the Greek and Indian schools have shown the possibility of a child being formed in the mother's womb without the seed of man—all indicate that the doctrine is a futile one on which to base Christ's claims to divinity.²

The miracles of Jesus are denied, belittled, explained away by the 'neurotic theory', and sometimes admitted, apparently for the sake of argument. The verse, 'A wicked and adulterous generation seeketh after a sign, and there shall be no sign given unto it', is thus mutilated and quoted to prove that Jesus Himself denied having performed any miracles.³ Such miracles as the turning of water into wine, the cursing of the fig tree, and the destruction of the herd of swine are cited as proofs of Jesus' lack of moral judgment.

The character and work of Jesus are challenged again and again by the Aḥmadī protagonists with such allegations as these, based on Bible references:

That He was given to drunkenness.

That He exceeded all bounds in vulgar abuse of the Jews.

That He was a coward and afraid to face death.

That He was disrespectful to His mother.

That He was friendly with women of questionable character.

That His teachings were too idealistic and impracticable.

That He grew angry and lost His temper.

That He was provincial, and that His message was only for the Jews.

That He was weak and helpless.

¹ The Holy Qur'ān, tr., Quadian, 1915, pt. I, 38.

² Review of Religions, I, 72.

³ Matt. 12 : 39.

That His mission was a failure.

That Jesus did not die on the Cross, and that there was no Resurrection.

AGAINST THE CHURCH

The attacks on organized Christianity are no less direct. As over against Islam, which is declared to be the only divinely-revealed religion, it is asserted that Christianity is a man-made religion. Paul, not Jesus, was its founder. Its ritual, feasts, and doctrines are but the modified sun-worship of pre-Christian times. The idea of the Book of Common Prayer being subject to alteration by Act of Parliament is held up to ridicule.

Social conditions in Christendom likewise come in for condemnation, and the superiority of Islam is pointed out. Legalized prostitution is far worse than polygamy. The condition of woman under Islam is preferable to that under Christianity, the following Qur'ānic and Biblical proofs being cited :¹

In the Bible

In the Qur'ān.

Made of man's rib. Gen. 2:21,22.

Made of the same essence as man.

Tempter to sin. Gen. 2:6.

Satan, not woman, the tempter to sin. II:36.

The cause of perpetuating sin.

No original sin. XCV:21.

To be ruled by man. Gen. 3:16.

Has equal rights with man. II:28.

Part and parcel of husband's property. Exod. 20:17.

Herself the owner of property. IV:32.

Meant for sorrow. Gen. 3:16.

Islamic marriage based on love. XXX:21.

Too unclean for a temple. II Chron. 8:11.

As clean as men. IV:129; XXXIII:35.

Doubly unclean. Lev. 12:2-5.

Used as a snare. I Sam. 18:21.

Such writers never grow weary in asserting that the true religion of Jesus was Islam; that Islam is not one of the religions of the world, but the universal religion of mankind; that Christianity is a failure and the churches of western lands are deserted; and that the final triumph of Islam in the world is imminent under the guidance vouchsafed to mankind in the person of the Promised Messiah, the Reformer and Prophet of the latter days.

THE AḤMADĪYAH COMMUNITY AND ORGANIZATION

The activity of the community in the work of propaganda is one of the chief marks of its vitality as well as the reason for its increase and growth. Beginning with a few followers in 1889, the community has grown until today its adherents of the Promised Messiah are to be found in all parts of India, Pakistan, Burma, Ceylon, Afghanistan, Egypt, Africa, Syria, Mauritius, England, France, Germany and America. Mirzā Ghulām Aḥmad died in 1908, and since then the affairs of the community were, until recently, directed by a Khalifah with headquarters in Qadian where an elaborate organization was created for carrying on the work of education and propaganda, which has spread literally to the ends of the earth. But even before his death, Ahmad had settled the main outlines of the work to be done. Qadian became the Mecca, so to speak, of the faithful, from which all influences for the spread of the new movement emanated, and where annually, in December, as many as possible assembled for the community gathering. To care for the interests and work of the community, two societies were formed: one called the Ṣadr-Anjuman-i-Aḥmadiyah, which looks after the executive and educational necessities of the community, and the other, the Anjuman-i-Taraqqī-i-Islam, which has charge of the propaganda efforts of the community. Well-organized offices at the headquarters care for this growing work, which entails an enormous amount of labour over details. An English high school is maintained also a madrāsah for the training of missionaries, and a school for girls; while primary schools have been opened in various districts.

The passion for print is evidenced by the fact that, besides the monthly journal, the Review of Religions, which appears in both English and Urdū, the following Urdū papers are published: al-Farūq, weekly, chiefly against the Ārya Samāj; al-Fadl, bi-weekly, for Aḥmadīs; Nūr, bi-monthly, chiefly for Sikhs; Miṣbāḥ, bi-monthly, for women; Aḥmadiyah Gazette, monthly, official organ. The Review of Religions is directed chiefly against Christianity. Besides these periodicals, an extensive literature has been prepared, one of the efforts being a translation of the Qur'ān into English, with elaborate notes directly attacking Christianity, and arguments supporting the claims of Aḥmad to be the Promised Messiah.

THE SCHISM

An event of fundamental importance occurred in the community when a group, headed by Khwajah Kamal-ud-Din and Maulvī Muḥammad 'Alī, seceded after the death of the first Khalīfah, Nūr-ud-Dīn, in 1914, and formed what is known as the Lahore party, the original group being called the Quadian party. This occurred at the time of the election of the second Khalīfah, or successor to Aḥmad, his son, Mirzā Bashīr-ud-Dīn Maḥmūd Aḥmad, being chosen. Though there were some minor differences over the method of control of the community which accentuated the party feeling, yet there was a far more basic difference which came to the surface, and which now definitely distinguishes the one from the other. This had to do with the nature of the claims of the founder. The Quadian party emphasize the fact that he must be regarded as a prophet (nabī), while the Lahore party insist that he was only a reformer (mujaddid) in Islam. The former insist on pressing the points of difference that exist between their views and those of other Muslims, while the Lahore party would minimize them.

The Lahore party was organized under the title of the Aḥmadīyah Anjuman-i-Ishā'at-i-Islam,¹ with Maulvī Muḥammad 'Alī² as its head. This section of the community likewise has an extensive missionary propaganda throughout India and in foreign countries. Khwājah Kamāl-ud-Dīn is Imām of the mosque at Woking, and head of the Mission to England; Maulvī Ṣadr-ud-Dīn is head of the Mission to Germany; and Maulvī Muḥammad 'Alī distinguished himself not only by the publication of numerous apologetic and polemic works, but especially by a complete translation of the Qur'ān into English, with a critical commentary which purports to present the results of the most modern Muslim scholarship. In the writings and work of these men and their associates, references to Mirzā Ghulām Aḥmad and his claims are scarcely to be found, though the hostile attitude to Christianity is all too evident.

¹ It publishes two interesting periodicals: The Light, a weekly published in Lahore; and The Islamic Review a monthly magazine founded in 1913.

² Maulvī Muḥammad 'Alī recently deceased.

THE QUADIANIS TODAY

Since the time of the schism it has been customary to refer to the original group, which from the beginning had its headquarters in Qadian, as the Quadianis, and the other as the Lahoris. The Lahore group tends more and more to merge in thought and practice with the orthodox community, and to have less and less in common with the Quadianis. Both groups have been actively engaged in over-seas Missions beginning with England and Germany, and other parts of Europe. More recently in America the Quadianis have established themselves in Washington D.C., and have built there the centre known as the Fazl Mosque. Their missionary organization, the Anjuman-i-Taraqqī-i-Islām, is claimed to be very successful. They report that not only have they made converts in Burma, Ceylon, China, Mauritius, Africa, Iran, Iraq, Arabia and Egypt, but also in the English speaking countries of the West, including America.

With the coming of the Partition of India in 1947, and the formation of the new state of Pakistan, a very critical situation suddenly developed. This especially affected the Quadianis who were left on the Indian side of the border in the district of Gurdaspur. Much as they disliked the idea of giving up their original headquarters and homes in Qadian, it ultimately became apparent that the great national upheaval, which had so suddenly overtaken the country as the result of Partition on July 14th, 1947 left them no choice but to move. The question was 'Where?' In due course it was 'revealed' to the present Khalifa, Hazrat Mirzā Bashīr-ud-Dīn Aḥmad, that the answer to this question was a place called Rabwah.¹ This was situated in a hilly and undeveloped area well over the border in West Pakistan. Here the new modern headquarters of the Quadianis has been built. From here their world-wide mission receives its directives. Here their extensive literature is published; and here their missionaries are trained. Although Qadian will never again be their headquarters, the name will always be associated with their particular brand of the Ahmadiyah movement.

¹ The Muslim World, April, 1955, Aḥmadiyyat in Pakistan by Prof. S. E. Brush, pp. 145-171.

For some time after the birth of Pakistan there had been rumblings of opposition to the Ahmadiyah among the orthodox leaders of the Muslim community in that country. This was obviously due to an admixture of jealousy with orthodoxy. In forming the government of the newly established country of Pakistan, the leaders chose as a member of the cabinet for the Foreign Ministry, a person of unusual ability and skill, Sir Chaudhry Muhammad Zafrullah Khān. He is, however, an outstanding member of the Qadiani community. This was too much for the ultra-orthodox 'ulamā'. Consequently a deputation waited on the Prime Minister and demanded that the government should declare the Ahmadis a non-Muslim minority; that Chaudhry Muhammad Zafrullah Khān be removed from the office of Foreign Minister, and to replace all other highly placed Ahmadis in government service. And if these demands were not granted the 'ulamā' would take matters into their own hands. They were not granted, with the result that serious rioting followed in the early part of 1953, especially in Lahore. The leaders of the agitation were jailed and the trouble ended. However, the orthodox Muslims still regard the Ahmadis, and especially the Qadianis, as heretics or non-Muslims.

It is stated by the Ahmadis of both persuasions, that 'the purpose for which the Movement exists is to purify Islam within, and to take this purified Islam to the world.' This being the case one will readily accept the judgment of Prof. Stanley Brush that, 'The future of the Ahmadiyah Movement will doubtless be as stormy as its past. The community, itself, expects difficulties and persecutions; and its leadership is constantly engaged in efforts to prepare its membership for them.'

THE PROBLEM FACING EDUCATED MUSLIMS

The hostile attitude to Christianity and the reasons lying behind it, together form one of the most difficult problems for the student of Islam in India and Pakistan. To be sure, Muslims are not alone to blame for their attitude toward Christianity. The failure of Christians to reflect the spirit of Christ must not be forgotten. The Crusades, and the spirit of the Crusades that too often in the past has been reflected by Christians in the Muslim controversy, must bear a share of the blame as well. In India and Pakistan Islam has come more closely into contact with Christianity in recent times than in any other country. One might think that the attitude of Islam toward Christianity here would exhibit a new spirit of toleration and appreciation.¹

However, such a change of front can hardly be said to be the case, if one is to judge from the attitude of most Islamic apologists. On the other hand, we find the newest and most aggressive forms of propaganda against Christianity which have ever appeared, and from here a world-wide programme of Muslim Foreign Missions is being maintained and financed. This, after all, is the logical issue of the spirit and teaching of Islam under the influence of modern conditions. It is one of the forms of adjustment which have been forced upon the Muslims of India and Pakistan, who are struggling for the defence and maintenance of their Faith in the face of the most disturbing and challenging conditions the world has ever known. The end no one can foresee. But it cannot be that honest, truth-seeking Muslims will continue indefinitely to refuse to face all the facts, and pursue a policy of evasion of the real issues of history and life, even though such investigation leads to a questioning and study of the very sources or revelation itself.

¹ A somewhat unique bit of evidence with regard to a new spirit of toleration comes from an altogether unexpected source. Khwājah Ḥasan Nizāmī, of the Tablīghī Mission, Delhi, in the year 1927 published a 'Life of Christ', called Ta'rikh-i-Masih, which he based on the four Gospels and the works of leading Christian scholars. The work is free from any sort of controversial comments, and the 'Life' is a remarkably true presentation of the Gospel record. His object in writing such a book was that Muslims might come to know exactly what Christians believe about Christ, and, by the imparting of such knowledge, to soften the attitude of Muslims toward Christians. The same author has prepared a similar book relating to Hinduism, called Krishna Biti, which is a 'Life of Krishna'.

There are still some who hold that Christians attempted such investigations at the peril of their faith. But it must be remembered by all lovers of truth, that truth itself is more important than any current interpretation thereof. God is constantly revealing more and more of His truth to men who seek for it. Consequently, after all the critical examination to which it has been subjected, the essential truth of Christianity is better attested and better understood to-day than ever before. The sum of it all is, that the highest revelation of God to man is through a living personality. That the modern Muslim apologist is becoming more and more conscious of the fundamental importance of this truth is revealed in the fact that he is emphasizing the personality and character of Muḥammad as the means by which God's grace was shed upon the world, and as the fact of central importance in Islam. The problem, therefore, for the Muslim as for the Christian investigator, is to apply the same honest and fearless critical methods to the study of Muḥammad and his revelation as have been applied to Jesus and the Bible.

The educated Muslims of India and Pakistan are in a better position to make this study than those of any other country. They are better trained in the scientific method; they have had freer contacts with other religions; they are more tolerant; they have better precedents to follow; they can conduct their work with less fear of reactionary opposition. The day for that will surely come, and when it does come another period in the development of Islam will have arrived: a period not less, and possibly even more, significant than that inaugurated by Sir Syed Aḥmad Khān, who was himself the prophet of the New Islam.

CONCLUSION

The introduction, spread, and development of Islam in India and Pakistan forms one of the most interesting phases of the whole world drama of Islam. Torn with internal divisions of sect and caste, and modified by the influence of their environment, the Muslims of India and Pakistan are none the less conscious of their fundamental unity. An account of the process which contributed to the formation of this diversity in unity has been sketched. With this picture before us, and in spite of all the weakness that division and communalism breed, one cannot but conclude that Islam in India and Pakistan to-day is better organized, better educated, more progressive, more reasonable and tolerant in its attitude toward its neighbours than ever before in its history. But the future glory of Islam in India and Pakistan will be shown in the extent to which it truly demonstrates a spirit of toleration, peace, brotherhood, and the uplift of woman, which, its apologists of the present day assert, represents the true Islam.

In fact, perhaps that day may be at the dawning even now ! There is in Hyderabad, India a group of Muslim scholars, The Council of the Academy of Islamic Studies. This group is deeply concerned about the status of Islam as a religion in the world today. It is eager to discover the reasons for its loss of religious leadership, in spite of the large growth in the Muslim World population. It declares that :

The mind of the Muslim almost everywhere is at a discount today. There is a lag between the life as enjoined on him by the Qur'ān and the life he has devised for himself. There is a lag between the social and political institutions which the Qur'ān desires him to install and the institutions which he has set up for himself and developed in the course of history. There is, in short, a big lag between the purpose of the present-day Muslim, his isolationist religiosity, and the abiding purpose of the Qur'ān, its universality and active humanism, the world purpose.¹

So, we trust, that the earnest search of this progressive group for a way out of the Islamic dilemma of today may prove to be as successful and useful, in its way, for the Muslim World, as was the solution found by Sir Syed Aḥmad Khāṇ for the Muslims of India in his day and since.

¹ The Muslim World, Jan. 1955, p. 92.

APPENDIX

I. HISTORICAL OUTLINE¹

- A.D.
- 711 The Arab conquest of Sind under Muḥammad bin Quāsim.
- 1001-30 The invasions by Maḥmūd of Ghaznī.
- 1193 Delhi became the capital of the Muslim Empire of the north under the Afghān dynasties: Ghūrīs, Khaljis, Tughluqs, Sayyids, and Lodīs.
- 1195 Gujarat annexed by Qutb-ud-Dīn Aybak.
- 1202 Bengal conquered by Bakhtyār Khalji.
- 1241 Mongol invasion.
- 1294 The Deccan invaded by 'Alā-ud-Dīn.
- 1306 Mālik Kāfūr conquered central and south India.
- 1327 Muḥammad Tughluq transfers his capital to the Deccan.
- 1347-1518 Spread of Islam in south by Shī'ah Bahmanī kings.
- 1347 The Deccan independent under 'Alā-ud-Dīn Bahman Shāh.
- 1352 Bengal united and independent under Ilyās.
- 1382 Foundation of Kingdom of Khandesh.
- 1394 The Sharquī (eastern) Kingdom of Jaunpur founded.
- 1396 Gujarat Kingdom founded.
- 1398 Invasion of Tīmūr.
- 1392 Malwa Kingdom founded.
- 1484-92 Foundation of Deccan Kingdoms of Berar, Bijapur Aḥmadnagar, and Bidar.
- 1512 Golkonda Kingdom founded.
- 1526 Bābur annexes Delhi and begins the establishment of the Mughul Empire.
- 1540 Battle of Kanauj: Sher Shāh defeats Humāyūn, who flees to Persia.

¹ The Cambridge History of India, III, ed. Sir Wolseley Haig, 664 ff., and R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

1. THE GREATEST OF THE MUGHULS

- 1556-1605 Akbar.
 1628-58 Shāh Jahān.
 1659-1707 Aurangzīb, greatest extent of Muslim power ever attained.

2. PERIOD OF DISINTEGRATION

- 1708 Revolt of the Sikhs.
 1738 The Marāthas advance to Delhi.
 1748 Afghān invasion under Ahmad Shāh.
 1820 Wahhābī revival under Sayyid Aḥmad.

3. THE BRITISH PERIOD

A. Period of Adjustment : up to 1864 marked by—

- 1857 1. The final putting down of the last political ambitions of the Mughuls by the deposition of Emperor Bahādur Shāh.
 2. Suppression of Persian as the official language.
 1864 3. The suspension of the appointment of quāḍīs as officials of the Government.

B. Developments since 1864 :

- 1875 Founding of the M.A.-O. College at Aligarh.
 1906 The All-India Muslim League organized.
 1913 The Waqf Validating Act passed.
 1920 The Aligarh Muslim University Act passed.
 The Khilafat Committee organized; Mr. Gandhi supports Khilafat Committee and secures temporary Hindu-Muslim Unity.
 1924 Abolition of the Turkish Caliphate—Indian Muslims greatly disturbed.
 1924-27 Serious Hindu-Muslim riots. Hindu-Muslim unity recognized as political necessity if independence was to be achieved.
 1926 Indian Muslim delegates participate in abortive Khilafat Conference at Cairo, and also Muslim World Conference at Mecca.

- 1930 Sir Muḥammad Iqbāl's Pākistān suggestion to Muslim League in Allahabad meeting.
- 1933 Pākistān National Movement organized by C. Raḥmat Alī and Indian students in Cambridge University.
- 1940 Lahore meeting All-India Muslim League, under presidency of Quāid-i-Azam Muḥammad Alī Jinnah, passed Pākistān Resolution. Said Jinnah, 'No power on earth can prevent Pakistan.'

4. INDEPENDENCE AND DEVELOPMENTS SINCE 1947

- 1947 August 14th—Birthday of Pakistan—Muḥamad Alī Jinnah installed as first Governor-General at Karachi.
August 15th—Birthday of India's Independence.
- 1956 February 29th—Pākistān's Constitution finalised.
March 23rd—Iskandar Mīrza installed as first President of The Islamic Republic of Pākistān.

II. GENERAL FACTS ABOUT ISLAM IN INDIA AND PĀKISTĀN¹

1. Population (Census of 1951)

(a) General Comparison

	India	%	Pākistān	%
Total Population ..	356,879,394	100.	75,636,000	100
Muslims ..	35,400,117	9.8	64,959,000	85.9
Hindus ..	303,186,986	84.9	9,770,000	12.9
Christians ..	8,157,765	2.2	541,000	0.7
Sikhs ..	6,219,134	1.7	—	—
Jains ..	1,618,406	.45	—	—
Buddhists ..	180,767	—	—	—
Zoroastrians ..	111,791	.45	366,000	0.5
Jews ..	26,781	—	—	—
Tribal & Other	1,977,647	.5	—	—
Totals ..	356,879,394	100	75,636,000	100

¹ The facts and figures in this section are taken from the 1951 Census Reports of India and Pākistān; and from the R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

(b). Comparison by Regions

I. INDIA¹

Regions	Total Population	Muslims	Per cent
I. North India	63,215,742	9,028,992	14.28
II. East India ..	90,130,206	11,838,684	13.1
III. South India ..	75,600,804	5,981,256	7.9
IV. West India ..	40,661,115	3,440,507	8.4
V. Central India ..	52,267,959	3,707,914	7.0
VI. Northwest India ..	34,972,597	1,397,981	3.9
Totals ² ..	356,848,423	35,395,334	9.8

I (a) REORGANIZED STATES

State	Area (Sq.Mi.)	Population (In millions ³)
1. Andhra Pradesh ..	110,250	32.2
2. Assam ..	84,924	9.0
3. Bihar ..	67,830 (app.)	38.93 (app.)
4. Bombay ..	188,240	47.8
5. Jammu and Kashmir ..	92,780	4.4
6. Kerala ..	14,980	13.6
7. Madhya Pradesh ..	171,200	26.1
8. Madras ..	50,170	30.0
9. Mysore ..	72,730	19.0
10. Orissa ..	60,140	14.6
11. Punjab ..	46,616	16.0
12. Rajasthan ..	132,300	16.0
13. Uttar Pradesh ..	113,410	63.2
14. West Bengal ..	33,279 (app.)	26.16 (app.)
		356.99 (app.)

Also six Centrally-administered territories: Andaman and Nicobar Islands, Delhi, Himachal Pradesh, Laccadive and Amindiye Islands, Manipur and Tripura. Population not given.

¹ The figures given herewith are taken from the India Census, 1951, Paper No. 2, Religion published in 1953. They are here by Regions, as the figures by States were not available at the time of reorganization, November 1, 1956.

² The reorganization of the States, which came into effect on November 1, 1956, included for the first time Jammu and Kashmir, with a total estimated population of 4.4 millions, according to the Census of India, 1951 (Paper No. 1, 1952, p. ii). The Muslim population at that time was estimated at 2,750,000. These figures

II. PAKISTAN¹

States	Total Population	Muslims	Per cent.
I. Baluchistan ..	1,154,000	1,137,000	98.5
II. East Bengal ..	41,932,000	32,227,000	76.8
III. Karachi ..	1,123,000	1,078,000	96.8
IV. N.W.F.P. ..	5,865,000	5,858,000	99.8
V. Punjab & Bahawalpur	20,637,000	20,201,000	97.8
VI. Sind & Khairpur ..	4,925,000	4,458,000	90.5
Totals ..	75,636,000	64,959,000	85.9

2. RACIAL ORIGIN²

Arabs : Arab immigrants found chiefly in Sind, Pakistan and occasionally elsewhere. They are Qurayshī Sayyids ; Hadramāwatis are found in Hyderabad especially. There are a few Somālīs, or Ḥabhīs in Bombay, India.

Persians : (Irānīs), and Turks, known as Mughuls are found in all parts of India and Pakistan.

Afghans or Pathāns : Found in all parts of India and Pakistan except the Deccan of India.

Hindu origin : The great majority of present-day Muslims of India and Pakistan are converts or descendants of converts, and are found chiefly in the two social classes : Shaykh and Julāhā. The number of the latter is increasing. They come from the Aryo-Dravidian races in the north, and from the Dravidian in the south.

3. SOCIAL CLASSIFICATION

This is determined chiefly or presumably by racial or national origin as the case may be :

Sayyid : Of Qurayshī Arab descent—the Arab tribe to which the Prophet Muhammad belonged.

for Jammu and Kashmir thus change the totals for the whole of India as well as for the Muslims. The total population for India then becomes 361,258,423 ; and the total for Muslims becomes 38,145,334, or 10.5 per cent. of the entire population.

¹ Census of Pakistan, 1951. Population according to Religion. Table 6, Census Bulletin No. 2.

² R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

- Shaykh* : Of direct Arab descent, but not of the tribe of the Prophet.
- Mughul* : Of Turkish descent because of the use of this term for the Mughul rulers of India.
- Pathān* : Of Afghān descent.
- Others* : Of Hindu origin. Often called Nau-Muslim (New Muslims).

4. THE PEACEFUL SPREAD OF ISLAM¹

Aside from the effect of militant Islam for the conversion of Hindus, the lower castes have been won to Islam chiefly from two causes so far as preaching is concerned :

(1) The Sunnī preachers, belonging chiefly to the mystic darwīsh orders, their leading representatives being : Mālik bin Dinar, Malabar Coast, A.D. 750 (?); Shaykh Ismā'il, Lahore, A.D. 1005; Sayyid Nathar Shāh, Trichinopoly, A.D. 1020; Mu'inud-Dīn Chishtī, Ajmīr, A.D. 1195; Sayyid Jalāl-ud-Dīn, Uch, Sind, A.D. 1244; Shaykh Jalāl-ud-Dīn Tabrizī, Bengal (d. 1244); Pīr Mahābīr Khamdāyat, Bijapur, A.D. 1304; Yūsuf Sindhī (Memons), Cutch, A.D. 1350; Sayyid' Alī Hamadānī, Kashmir, A.D. 1388. The movement has been greatly extended with the rise of Muslim congregations around the tombs of the saints of Ajmīr, Delhi, Pāk Pattan, Panipat, Uch, Gulbarga, and Sylhet.

(2) The Ismā'īlian preachers, of the two sects, Nizārite (Khojahs) and Musta'lite (Bohrah), who adopted the method of syncretism in preparing their teachings for their disciples, and using chiefly the Hindu theology and terminology as a basis for approach. They made headway chiefly in Sind from the ninth to the fifteenth centuries; and in Gujarat in the twelfth and fifteenth centuries; Quarmaṭian preachers in Sind, ninth century on; Abd Allāh (Bohrah), Gujarat, A.D. 1067; Nūr Satāgar (Khojahs), Gujarat, A.D. 1140 (?); Ṣadr-ud-Dīn (Khojahs), Sind, A.D. fifteenth century.

¹ R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

5. MUSLIM SECTS IN INDIA AND PAKISTAN¹

- (1) Sunnīs : Are the most numerous and may be classified as follows :
- (a) Ḥanafīs : which number more than two-thirds of the entire Muslim Population of India and Pakistan.
- (b) Shāfi'īs : the Mappillas found chiefly on the Malabar coast.
- (c) Sunnīs with Wahhābī tendencies : Uttar Pradesh, India ; E. Bengal, Pakistan, and north-west areas of West Pakistan belonging to the following groups—Salafiyah ; Ahl-i-Ḥadīth ; Farā'idīyah ; Ghayr-Muqallid ; Ahl-i-Qur'ān.
- (d) Sunnīs with modern tendencies : Neo-Mu'tazilites or Necharīs. First and chief leader, Sir Syed Ahmad Khan, who established the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, Aligarh, 1875. Other important leaders have been Rt. Hon. Syed Amīr 'Alī, a Shī'āh ; Sir Muhmamad Iqbāl, Prof. S. Khudā Baksh, H.H. the Āghā Khān, head of the Āghā Khānī Khojahs, Dr. Zākir Ḥussayn the present Vice-Chancellor of the Aligarh Muslim University, and many others.
- (e) Irregular Sunnīs : Memons of Cutch, Maḥdawīs of Gujarat, Dhīkrīs of Balūchistān ; the Aḥmadīs (Aḥmadīyah sect), founded by Mirza Ghulām Aḥmad of Qadian, E. Punjab, India. Two branches ; (a) the original Quādiānī with its headquarters in Quādiān, E. Punjab, India ; (b) The Lahorī with headquarters in Lahore, Pakistan. Since Partition the former group has moved its headquarters to Rabwāh in West Punjab, Pākistān. Both groups are very active propagandists with missionaries working all over the world, as well as in India and Pākistān.

¹ R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

(2) Shī'ahs:

- (a) Ithnā 'Ashariyah, or 'Twelvers' (Imāmīs) found chiefly in Oudh, Uttar Pradesh, India and certain other Indian states as Rāmpur, U.P., and Hyderabad, Andhrā Pradesh. Their chief centre is Lucknow.
- (b) Ismā'ilīs: Bohrahs in Bombay city and Gujarat; while the Khojahs are found in Bombay, India; and also in Pakistan: in Karāchī and Sind; and West Punjab. One section known as the Aghā Khāni has the Aghā Khān as its head. To the Bombay section belonged the late Qāid-i-Azam Muḥammad Alī Jinnah, the founder and first Governor-General of Pakistan.

6. INDO-MUSLIM SECTS¹

Certain Indo-muslim sects have also been developed which attempted to reconcile the antagonistic cultures of Islam and Hinduism on a mystic basis. The chief groups are the Kabīrpanthīs and the Sikhs. Other similar groups are the Ḥusaynī Brāhmans, the Satnāmīs and the Pīrzādas. Prince Dārā Shikūh, in the middle of the seventeenth century, attempted a most remarkable synthesis of Hindu-Muslim culture and religion; but both his and Akbar's efforts remained isolated examples of attempts to bridge the gap.

7. THE RELIGIOUS ORDERS

(1) The Regular or Ba-Shar' Orders Sunnite.

- (a) Chishtīyah, Mu'īn-ud-Dīn Chishti, Ajmīr, A.D. 1195.
Chief branches:
Nizāmi (Nizām-ud-Dīn Awliyā, Delhi).
Šābirī ('Alī Ahmad Šābir, Piran Kalir, Rurki).
- (b) Suhrawardīyah, Bahā-ud-Dīn Zakarīyā, Multan, A.D. 1250.
- (c) Shaṭṭārīyah, Abīd Allāh Shaṭṭari, Malwa (d. A.D. 1406).

¹ R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

- (d) Quadiriyaḥ, Sayyid Bandagī Muḥammad Ghawth, Uch (A.D. 1482-d. 1517).
- (e) Naqshbandīyah, Khwājah Muḥammad Baqī Bi'llāh Berang, died, Delhi, A.D. 1603.
- (2) The Irregular or Be-Shar' Orders. Sunnite.
- (a) Qualandariyah, Abū (Bū) 'Alī Qualandar, d., Panipat, A.D. 1323.
- (b) Benawā.
- (c) Naushāhī, Ḥājī Pīr Muḥammad Sachiar, Naushahra, Punjab.
- (d) Jalālī, Punjab.
- (e) Madārī, Zinda Shāh Madār, d. A.D. 1436, Makanpur, Oudh.
- (f) Rafā'i (Gurzmār).
- (g) Miscellaneous : Mūsā Sohāgīs, Malang, Shamsī, Alif Shāhī, Dafalī, Mawlāi.

8. LANGUAGES USED BY MUSLIMS IN INDIA AND PAKISTAN¹

While there are at least seventeen important languages used by the Muslims of India and Pakistan, yet most of these have only local or State-wide significance compared with Urdū. Urdū is the Muslim lingua franca of both countries. It is used to a greater or less extent in every state of India and Pakistan. Though as a mother-tongue it is claimed by a smaller number than Bengālī, which would lead the list from this point of view, yet it must be remembered that there are millions, whose mother-tongue is another vernacular, who also use Urdū, or Western Hindī as it is sometimes called. For these reasons Urdū easily can claim first place as the Muslim language of India and Pakistan. Persian is largely used as a literary language of the educated classes. Arabic, as a theological language, is still used in all the principal madrāsahs. English is extensively used by those of modern education.

The following tables, compiled from the Census of India Report, 1921, are useful in indicating the polyglot nature of the Muslim community in both India and Pakistan.

¹ Census of India Report, 1921.

Unfortunately up to date statistics along these lines are not available :

(1) Languages used in India and Pakistan in order of Importance

Urdū (Western Hindi)	Mālayālam
Bengālī	Telūgū
Punjābī	Oriya
Sindhī	Balūchī
Kashmīrī	Brāhuī
Pushtū	Arabic
Gujarātī	Persian
Tāmil	Others as well

In addition to these 15 languages English is used as well and Hindi is used to a limited extent.

All of the above languages used by Muslims have been greatly modified by contact with Islam, through large infusion of Arabic and Persian words in the vocabulary. Urdu is often described as Musulmani Hindī, just as the language of Bengali used by Muslims is called Musulmānī Bengālī. Tāmil, Punjābī and Kashmīrī have also undergone a similar change. Many of the Indo-Muslim languages, too, have adopted the use of the Arabic character. The chief of these are Urdū, Sindhī, Punjābī, Tāmil, and Kashmīrī.

(2) Languages Distribution by States, and Areas

INDIA		PAKISTAN
(a) Urdū	(b) Bengālī	(a) Urdū
Andamans	Assām	Balūchistān
Assām	Bengāl	E. Bengāl
Bombay	(c) Punjābī	Karāchī Area
Bihār	E. Punjāb	N.W.F.P.
Bengāl (W)		Punjāb
Kashmīr	(d) Sindhī	Sind
Keralā	Bombay	(b) Bengālī
Madhyā
Prādes̄h	(e) Kashmīrī	E. Bengāl
Madrās	Kashmīr	(c) Punjābī
Mysore	(f) Gujarātī	N.W.F.P.
Orissa	Bombay	W. Punjāb
Punjāb	(g) Tāmil	(d) Sindhī
Rājāsthān	Madrās	Karāchī Area

Uttar Prādes̄h	(h) Mālayālam	(e) Pushtū
	Kerala	Balūchistān
	(i) Telugu	N.W.F.P.
	Andhra Pradesh	W. Punjāb
	(j) Orīya	(f) Bālūchī
	Bīhār	Balūchistān
	Orissa	(g) Brāhuī
	(k) Persian	Balūchistān
	Bombay	(h) Persian
		Balūchistān
		N.W.F.P.
		W. Punjab

9. EDUCATION

Higher Educational Institutions and Centres of Islamic Culture.

(a) India

Aligarh : Muslim University, founded 1875 ; Women's College also.

Aurangabad : Anjūman-i-Taraqi-i-Urdū.

Azamgarh : Shiblī Academy, publishers of Ma'ārif.

Bankipur (Patna) : The Khudā Bakhsh Library, the leading Oriental (Arabic and Persian) library in India.

Calcutta : The Calcutta Madrasah.

Delhi : (Jāmia Nagar), Jāmia Millīa Islāmīa (National Muslim University) founded, 1920 at Aligarh by Maulana Muhammad Ali.

Yunānī Medical School founded by Ḥakim Ajmal Khān.

Deoband : Dār-ul-U'lum, the al-Azhar of India, founded 1867.

Hyderabad : Osmānīa University founded, 1917.

Lucknow : The Shī'ah College ; Shī'ah, Madrasat-ul-Wā'izīn ; Faranghī Mahal Madrasah, Nizāmi, Sunnī ; and the Nadwat-ul-'Ūlamā.

Ponani (Malabār) : The chief madrasah of the Mappillās.

Poona : Jamī'yat-i-Da'wat-o-Tablīgh-i-Islām with 13 branches.

Quādiān, India : Formerly original headquarters of Quādiāni Aḥmadīs, now removed to Rabwah, W. Punjab, Pakistan.
 Rāmpur : Rāmpur Library one of the best Oriental collections in India ; also an art collection.

(b) Pākistān

Dacca : Dacca University.

Hyderābād : Sind University.

Karachi : Kārači University ; Dow Medical College.

Lahore : Punjāb University ; Aḥmadī Lahore Party headquarters.

Peshāwar : Peshawar University.

Rabwāh : Present headquarters of Quādiāni Aḥmadīs.

III. THE PRINCIPAL MUSLIM FESTIVALS

I. SUNNĪ

1. Those Officially recognized by the Mughul Emperors :

- (1) Muḥaram 10th ('Ashurah).
- (2) Ṣafar 13th (by decree of Jahāngīr), Akhīri Chār Shambah, the last convalescence of the Prophet.
- (3) Sha'bān 14th, Shab-i-Barāt—the Night of the Book or Record. It is thought that this is the night on which God records all actions of mankind which will be performed during the year to come, and the names of those who will be born and die. It is celebrated with fireworks.
- (4) Ramaḍān 21st—Death of 'Alī.
- (5) Shawwāl 1st, 'Id-ul-Fiṭr—the Breaking of the Fast of Ramadan.
- (6) Dh'i-Ḥijjah 18th, Ī'd-uḍ-Ḍuha, or Baqarah 'Īd—the Feast of the Sacrifice of the Cow (Baqarah).

2. Others commonly observed :

- (1) Rajab 27th, Mi'rāj—the Miraculous Night-journey of the Prophet.
- (2) Ramaḍān 27th, Laylat-ul-Quadr—the Night of the Revelation of the Qur'ān.

- (3) Rabi-'ul-Awwal, 12th—Bārah Wafāt commemorates the death of the Prophet (in India), though it is also observed throughout the Muslim world as the day of his birth, and, as such, is known as the Mawlid.
3. Anniversaries of the Saints' 'Urs (the date of death is observed) :
- (1) Sālār Mas'ūd Ghaznawi, Muḥarram 11th, d. A.D. 1033, Bahraich, Ōūdḥ, U.P., India.
 - (2) Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī, Rajab 6th, A.D. b. 1236, Ajmīr, Rajputana, India.
 - (3) Quṭb-ud-Dīn Bakhtyār Kākī Chishtī, Rabī' I 14th, A.D. 1236, Old Delhī, India.
 - (4) Bābā Farīd-ud-Dīn Shakarganj Chishtī, Muḥarram 5th, A.D. 1265, Pāk Pattan, Punjab, W. Pakistan.
 - (5) Nīzam-ud-Dīn Awliyā, Chishī . . , A.D. -1325, Delhi, India.
 - (6) 'Alī Aḥmad Ṣābir, Chishtī, Rabī' I 13th, A.D. 1291, Piran Kalir, Rurki, U.P., India.
 - (7) Gīsu Darāz, Chishtī, Dhi'l-Qua'dah 16th, A.D. 1325 (?), Gulbarga, Deccan, India.
 - (8) Abū (Bū) 'Alī Qualandar, Ramadan 13th, A.D. 1323, Panipat, E. Punjab., India.
 - (9) Zinda Shāh Madār, Jumāda I 17th, A.D. 1436, Makanpur, Oudh, U.P., India.
 - (10) Khwājah Khidr.

2. SHĪ'AH

IMĀMITE (as in Persia).¹

In addition to the two 'Īds which are required of all Muslims ('Īd-ul-Fitr and 'Īd-uḍ-Ḍuḥā), the Shī'ahs have officially recognized a certain number of festivals connected with the history of their Twelve Imāms.

1. Muḥarram 1—10. . Ceremonies connected with the martyrdom of Ḥusayn. 'Ashurah, or the 10th, being the climax.
2. " 22. Death of Mūsā Kāzīm.
3. " 26. Death of Zayn-ul-'Ābdīn.

¹ R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

4. Şafar	1. Between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah at Siffin.
5. "	3. Birth of Bāqir.
6. "	7. Birth of Mūsā Kāzim.
7. "	17. Death of 'Alī Riḍā (2nd festival : Ramḍān 24th).
8. "	20. Ziyārat-ul-Arba'in.
9. Rabi' I	5. Birth of Ḥusayn (2nd festival : Sha'bān 3rd).
10. "	8. Death of Ḥasan 'Askarī.
11. "	12. Mawlid, birth of the Prophet.
12. Rabi' I	14. Usurpation of Abū Bakr.
13. "	15. Death of Yazīd, who had caused the death of Ḥusayn.
14. Rabi' II	4. Birth of Ḥasan 'Askarī.
15. Jumādā I	4. Death of Ḥasan.
16. "	15. Birth of Zayn-ul-'Abdīn.
17. Jumādā II	3. Death of Fāṭimah (2nd festival : Ramadān 2nd).
18. "	20. Birth of Fāṭimah (2nd festival : Shā'bān 15th).
19. Rajab I	2. Birth of 'Alī Naqī.
20. "	13. Birth of 'Alī.
21. "	27. Mi'rāj of the Prophet.
22. Sha'bān	15. Birth of Mahdī.
23. Ramadān	1. Rūyā.
24. "	15. Birth of Ḥasan, and Muḥammad Taqī.
25. "	21. Death of 'Alī.
26. "	27. Execution of his assassin, Ibn Muljam.
27. Shawwāl	4. Disappearance of the XIIth Imām, Mahdī in A.H. 265, A.D. 879.
28. "	12. Miracle of Shaqq-ul-Quamar (Splitting of the Moon).
29. "	25. Death of Ja'far as-Siddīq.
30. Dhū'l-Qa'dah	11. Birth of 'Alī Riḍā.
31. Dhū'l-Ḥijjah	13. Accession of 'Alī to the caliphate.
32. "	18. Investiture of 'Alī by the Prophet.
33. "	25. Festival of Khātm Baksh.
34. "	26. Death of the usurper 'Umar.

IV. NOTES ON THE REGIONS AND STATES

A. INDIA¹(1) North India Region :

Uttar Pradesh.—9,028,992 Muslims out of a total of 63,215,742 inhabitants. The 1951 Census Report comments as follows: 'The Muslim proportion to the total population which stood at 13.74 in 1881, steadily rose to 15.43 in 1941 but has now declined to 14.28, the figure at which it stood in 1901. The decline is entirely explained by the departure of some Muslims to Pakistan. Thus the percentage has changed but little through the years in spite of continuous Muslim administration from the fall of the kingdom of Kanauj in the twelfth century: the sovereigns of Delhi, the Sharqī kings of Jaunpur (A.D. 1394-1500), Mughul governors and Nawabs of Oudh. Part of the families of the latter have been refugees in Baghdad since 1857.'

Lucknow, Agra, Bareilly and Aligarh are the most important Muslim cities in the State. In Bareilly there is an important madrāsah, which provides training for those maulvis who will serve congregations of Muslims primarily in rural areas. The Muslims of this state are Sunni Ḥanafites, Wahhābīs and Shī'ahs (Twelvers), which are found chiefly in Lucknow. This city is the centre of Indian Shī'ahs, because of the ancient Nawābs of Oudh, who erected the chief buildings there.

The Muslims of the province by origin are indicated as follows—Arab: Shaykh, Qurayshī, Siddīqī, Farūqī, 'Uthmānī and Ansārī; Afghāns: Yūsufzāis, Afrīdīs, Ghūrīs, Lodīs, and Sherwānīs; Mughuls or Quizilbāsh, and Hindu converts: Julāhās.

The semi-Muslim sect of the Kabīrpanthīs has a centre at Benares, and the Satnāmīs are found in Oudh.

There are four great educational centres for the Muslims: Aligarh, which is the modern reform centre where the Muslim university, founded by Sir Syed Ahmad Khān, is located; Deoband, in the Saharanpur district, where the orthodox Sunnī madrasah, Dār-ul-'Ulūm, is found; Azamgarh, centre of the moderate Sunnī reform movement; and Lucknow, with its Shī'ah College, affiliated with the Lucknow University, and the seminary, Madrasat-ul-Wā'izīn.

¹ 1951 Census Reports of India and Pakistan; and the R.M.M. Annuaire, 1925.

Agra was the capital of Akbar (d. A.D. 1605). Here are found his tomb (at Sikandra) and the Taj Mahal. At Bahraich is found the tomb of the Ghaznawī martyr prince, Sālār Mas'ūd (d. A.D. 1033), which was uncovered in the fifteenth century. He is greatly venerated under the name of Ghāzi Miyān.

(2) East India Region :

This region has a total population of 90,130,206 with a Muslim community of 11,838,684 or 13.1 per cent. It comprises three former provinces of Bihār, Orissa, and Assām together with West Bengāl and three states of Manipur, Tripūra, and Sikkim. There is a minority of Muslims around Patna, Bihār, which is imbued with a fervent and aggressive religious zeal of Wahhābī tendencies. At Gaya are found some Shī'ahs. There is a Khānaqah, or monastery, of Shaykh Kabīr Darwish (d. A.D. 1717) at Sāsarām; and a library of Khudā Bakhsh (d. 1876) at Bankipūr. The tomb of Shah Arzakī (d. A.D. 1623) is venerated. There is a group of some 20,000 Kabīrpanthīs at Sambalpūr, Orissa.

Assām has a Muslim population of 1,996,456 which is chiefly found around Sylhet, where Jalāl-ud-Dīn preached and was buried, A.D. 1384. The low caste of Muslims are called Mātias.

West Bengāl has a total population of 24,810,308 of whom 4,925,496 are Muslims or 19.8 percent.

(3) South India Region :

This Region has a total population of 75,600,804 with a Muslim community of 5,981,256 or 7.9 per cent. It includes the former Province of Madras with the states of Mysore, Travancore-Cochin and Coorg. The Laccadive Islands off the west coast of Malabar are entirely Muslim with between 12,000 and 15,000 inhabitants, Mappillas.

The Muslims of South India are of the Dravidian Race. The Shaykh, Sayyid and Pathān classes, however, numbering well over, 1,000,000 use Urdū. Tāmīl is written in Arabic characters. The Mappillas of Malabār speak Mālayālam. They are a mixed people, part Arab, and follow the law of ash-Shāfi'ī. Their chief religious heads are at Kondatti and Ponani. At the latter place there is a well-known school for training missionaries and converts.

(4) West India Region :

This Region has a total population of 40,661,115 with a Muslim community of 3,440,507 or 8.4 per cent. It includes most of the former Province of Bombay, Saurashtra and Cutch, but exclusive of Sind, which is in West Pakistan. In Cutch the Muslims form about 20 per cent of the population, and are mostly a semi-Muslim sect called Memons converted about the fourteenth century. In Saurashtra the Muslims number 422,000 or 10.1 per cent of the population.

Gujarāt was a Muslim state from the fourteenth century to the seventeenth. The chief Muslim city is Ahmadābād. The Bohrais, Khojahs and Mahdawīs are found in addition to orthodox Sunnis. On the coast of the Konkan are found Sunnī descendants and converts of Arab immigrants of the early centuries. They are called Konkanīs. In Bombay there are separate mosques for Sunnis, for Bohrās and Khojahs and Mughuls. The Āghā Khān, who is the head of a branch of the Isma'īlian Khojahs, for many years made his headquarters in Bombay. He was the first president of the All-India Muslim League in 1906.

(5) Central India Region :

This Region comprises the following units : Madhyā Prādes̄h, Madhyā Bhārat, Hyderābād, Vindhvā Prādes̄h and Bhopāl. It has a total population of 52,267,959 and a Muslim community of 3,707,914 or 7.0 per cent. The most important Muslim area is Hyderābād, concerning which the 1951 Census Report, Paper No. 2, 1953, page 35 says :

During the last fifty years the Muslims of Hyderābād have increased by about 91 per cent. Their percentage to the total population of the State is now 11.8 per cent as against 10.4 per cent in 1901. Their increase is due more to immigration of Muslims from outside the State than to any other reason. There was continuous migration of Muslims into this State, particularly since 1857, from the rest of India. This immigration was not excessive until about 1947. In 1947 the number of immigrants which at first was in thousands soon increased to lakhs, and they were of all descriptions, drawn both from urban and rural classes. The influx, however, came to an abrupt end on the 13th of September, 1948, the day on which the armed forces of India moved into the State in response to the call of the people. Almost simultaneously a reverse movement started, with most of the immigrants going back to their homes in other States. A number of local Muslims also migrated to Pakistan. Thus the 1941-51 decade witnessed both an influx of Muslims into the State and an exodus from it on a very exaggerated scale.¹

The Muslim dynasty of the Nizam was founded by Subadār Āsaf Jāh (d. 1748). The Osmāniā University initiates an experiment of giving instruction in Urdū, which was continued for a time. In this connection it produced a distinct literature in Urdū through its translation and publication of western scientific and literary texts. There is an important colony of Ḥadramāwtī Arabs here, who are Shāfi'is. The majority are Sunnī Ḥanafī. There are some Shī'ites and Mahdawīs also.

Bhopal was founded as a Muslim State in 1701 by an Afghan Nawāb. Its total population in 1951 was 836,474 of whom 128,672 were Muslims, approximately 12 per cent.

(6) North-West India Region :

This Region consists of the following units: Rājāsthān, E. Punjāb and the additional smaller units: Himāchāl Prādes̄h, Bilāspur, Patiālā and East Punjāb States Union, Delhi, and Ājmer. Its total population is given as 34,972,597 of which number 1,397,981 or 3.9 per cent are Muslims.

The Muslims in Rājāsthān and Ājmer show a marked decrease as compared with the 1941 Census. In Rājāsthān they number only 6.2 per cent, and in Ājmer 7.1 per cent. This sudden decrease among the Muslims is due to the emigration to Pakistan. In this area the Muslims are mostly derived from the Rājputs, Jāts and Gūjars. The tomb of Mu'īn-ud-Dīn Chishtī (d. A.D. 1236) is found in Ājmer. He founded the Chishtī order in India and Pakistan.

¹ Census of India, Paper No. 2, Religion—1951 Census, p. 35.

(7) Jammū and Kashmīr, exclusīve of Āzād Kashmīr :¹

The reorganization of the States in India, which came into effect on the 29th September, 1956 includes for the first time the state of Jammū and Kashmīr, with a total estimated population of 4.41 millions, according to the Census of India Report, 1951 as found in Census Paper No. 1, 1952, p. ii. The Muslim population at that time in that area was estimated at 2,750,000 or 62.3 per cent of the whole.

The act of formal accession to India by the Constituent Assembly of Jammū and Kashmīr on January 26, 1957, has been challenged by Pakistan on the ground that it is ultra vires. Pakistan contends that in accordance with the United Nations Security Council resolutions of August, 1948, both India and Pakistan agreed that a free and impartial plebiscite would be held to decide the status of Jammū and Kashmīr. Since the plebiscite had not been held previous to this action taken by the Jammū and Kashmīr 'Constituent Assembly', Pakistan rejects, as illegal, the action of India in accepting the accession of Jammū, and Kashmīr before a plebiscite has been held. The matter was again placed before the United Nations for consideration.

Kashmīr was Islāmized about the twelfth century by Ismā'īlian missionaries, and in the fourteenth by Sunnī mystics, the most noted of whom being Sayyid 'Alī Hamadānī, who converted the dynasty in A.D. 1326. The king, Sikandar, nicknamed Butshikān, or Idol-breaker, who died A.D. 1417, destroyed many Hindu temples, Kashmīr was a famous summer resort for the Mughul emperors of Delhi.

In Jammū are found Rājput Muslims. To the north-east the people of Bāltistān are Ismā'īlians.

It is in Srinagar that the tomb of one Yūs Āsaf is found, which was located by Mirzā Ghulām Ahmad of Quādiān, in Khān Yār Street. It is this tomb which he and the adherents of the Ahmadiyah sect declare is the real tomb of Jesus Christ.

¹ See section B. Pakistan, para. VII.

There are many places of pilgrimage for Muslims in Kashmīr, which are locally termed 'ziyārat'. Part are the tombs or sacred sites of indigenous Hindu or Buddhistic origin. Others are tombs of foreigners called Sayyid, īrzada. There is also a local religious order of jugglers called Sayyid Makkār.

B. PAKISTAN¹

(1) Balūchistān :

This State has a total population of 1,154,000 of which number 1,137,000 are Muslims or 98.5 per cent. These are mostly Sunnis, but heterodox Dhikrīs or Mahdawīs and Ismāīlians are also found. Quite a number of Muslims are Brahūīs by race.

(2) East Bengal :

This State has a total population of 41,932,000 of which number 32,227,000 or 76.8 per cent are Muslims. The Islāmization of this area was due to the governors of Bengāl from A.D. 1202, after the Ghurid conquest, who had their headquarters at Gaur (Lakhnauti). Jatmall, son of Rājā Kāns, accepted Islam and mounted the throne in A.D. 1414, with the name Jalāl-ud-Dīn Muhammad Shāh. Mūrshid Qūlī Khān founded the line of Nawābs of Murshidābād. He converted many Hindus. The majority of the Muslims, aside from the Paṭhāns, is composed of Bengālī converts, Shaykhs coming from the low-caste Julāhās and outcastes. The greater part are Sunnis of the Ḥanafite school. There are a few Shī'ahs at Dacca. The low-castes of the south and east profess an aggressive and fanatical form of Islam, and are termed Wahhābīs; notably the sect of the Farā'idīyah founded by Shari'at Allāh, and his son, Dūdū Miyān (d. A.D. 1862), who attacked British forces and rejected saint worship. They are found in the villages, and are often called Salāfiyah, or Ghair-muquallid. There are very important waqfs in East Bengal (East Pākistān).

¹ Census of Pakistan, 1951 : Census Bulletin, No. 2, Table 6, Population according to Religion.

(3) Karāchī :

This new State was formed from the area immediately around the city of Kārachī, an important sea-port of Pākistān, and the capital of the country. The number of Muslims at the present time according to the 1951 Census is 1,078,000 out of a total population of 1,123,000 or 96.8 per cent. It was here that the first Government of Pākistān was installed on August 14th, 1947 and Quāid-i-'Azam Muhammad Alī Jinnah took over the reins of government as its first Governor-General. The common language of West Pākistān is Urdū while Mussalmānī Bengali is used in East Pākistān.

(4) North-West Frontier Province :

The total population of the State is 5,865,000 of which number 5,858,000 are Muslims or 99.8 per cent. The people are largely war-like tribes of Pathans from Afghanistan : Bannūchīs, Dards, Marwats, Yūsufzāis, Niāzīs, Wazīrīs, Ghilzāis, Mohmands, Afrīdīs, Orakzāis. Some of the tribes are Sunnīs : Bannūchīs, Marwats ; some are Wahhābīs, Yūsufzāis and Bonāirs of Dir, and were connected with the jihād which was carried on against the Sikhs by Sayyid Ahmad, of Rae Bareli, in 1826. The rest are neo-Ismā'ilīans, having been converted since the twelfth century. They are found in Bāltistān (Mughuls) Chitrāl, Panyāl, Ludkho, Wakhān, Hunzā, and Hazāra. The Afrīdīs, who made a jihād against Britain in 1897, are of the Roshaniyah sect, which was founded in the sixteenth century by Miyān Bayazīd, or Pīr Roshan. The Quādirī order of the Sunnīs has adherents in Derā Ghāzī Khān.

(5) Punjāb and Bahāwalpūr ;

The total population numbers 20,637,000 out of which Muslims number 20,201,000 or 97.8 per cent. Sikhs, which at one time numbered more than two millions have all migrated to India, following Partition in 1947 !

The Punjāb was invaded as far as Multan by the Arab general, Muhammad bin Quāsīm, about A.D. 711. At the end of the ninth century a sect of Muslims, known as Quarmaṭians, from al-Ahsa, in Bahrein, Arabia, founded a principality at Multan. This continued till the invasion of Mahmūd of Ghaznī, in the eleventh century, when an attempt was made to put an end to the heresy of the Quarmaṭians and Isma'ilians and establish the orthodox Sunnī religion. Through the efforts of some of the conquerors and the Sūfī preachers of Uch and Pāk Pattan, most of the converts became Sunnīs.

The work of the Sūfīs, or mystics, in attempting to bring about a reconciliation of Hinduism and Islam, resulted in the creation of the curious syncretism of the Sikhs, founded by Gurū Nānak, who died in A.D. 1539.

Many low castes have been converted en masse to Sunnī Islam.

The tombs of the saints of Uch, Jalāl Surkhposh (d. A.D. 1291) and Muhammad Ghawth (d. A.D. 1517) together with that at Pāk Pattan of Bābā Farīd Shakarganj (d. A.D. 1265), are greatly venerated.

(6) Sind and Khairpur :

The total population numbers 4,925,000 out of which Muslims number 4,458,000 or 90.5 per cent.

Sind is that part of the India-Pākistān area where the first Muslim invasion from Arabia took place in the year 711 A.D. under the leadership of Muhammad bin Quāsīm. There are many inhabitants of Sind today whose ancestors came from Arabia. The centre of the old Muslim province is said to have been a place called Thattā, of which there is apparently no trace today.

(7) Āzād Kashmīr :

This portion of the original Jammū and Kashmīr territory lies to the north-west of that portion that has acceded to India. At the same time, strictly speaking, it is not yet legally recognized as a state of Pākistān, but is regarded by Pākistān as being 'an independent entity with its own Government.'¹ This status will obviously continue until such time as the State itself should decide whether to remain independent or accede to Pākistān in accordance with the principle expressed in the Constitution of Pākistān, Article 203 which reads : ' When the people of the State of Jammu and Kashmīr decide to accede to Pākistān the relationship between Pākistān and the said State shall be determined in accordance with the wishes of the people of that State.'

¹ Pākistān Daily News, 5th February, 1957. Information Dept., High Commission for Pākistān, London.

This part of the original state of Jammū and Kashmīr lies to the north-west of the portion that has acceded to India. The boundary between these two portions of the original Jammū and Kashmīr area is known as the ' Cease Fire Line '. This name refers to the events of the unhappy days in 1947 following Partition, when hostilities broke out between India and Pākistān due to the invasion of Kashmir by tribal elements. These were resisted by Indian troops. Finally with the help of United Nations ' observers ', this ' Cease Fire Line ' was established in August, 1948, and still remains the boundary line between the two areas. Since then, this portion of the original Jammū and Kashmīr State has been known as Āzād Kashmīr.

Āzād Kashmīr has an estimated population of about 800,000. Its provisional capital is Muzaffarabad, which is perched high among the crags of the Pirpanjal range in the lower Himalayas. It is technically not yet a part of Pākistān, for according to Article 203¹ of the Constitution of Pākistān, the plebiscite therein envisaged for the entire original state of Jammū and Kashmīr was never held. Āzād Kashmīr is, however, naturally related to Pākistān and is regularly included (unofficially) in reports in the Pākistān Year Book.

¹ Art. 203. When the people of the State of Jammū and Kashmīr decide to accede to Pākistān, the relationship between Pākistān and the said State shall be determined in accordance with the wishes of the people of that State. The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pākistān, p. 61.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

I. Books

- Abbas Khan : Ta'rikh-i-Sher Shahi, E.D., IV.
Abd Allah : Ta'rikh-i-Daudi, E.D., IV.
Abd Allah Chakralawi : Isha'at-ul-Qur'an. Lahore, A.H. 1320 (Urdu) Radd-un-Naskh al-Mashhur fi Kalam Allah al-Ghafur, Lahore, 1909. (Urdu)
Ruh-ul-Insan kama bayyana al-Qur'an. Lahore, 1907. (Urdu)
Abd-ul-Hamid Lahori : Badshah-namah, E.D., VII. —ed. W. N. Lees, Kabir Ahmad and Abd-ur-Rahim, 2 vols. Calcutta, 1867-68. (Persian)
Abd-ul-Quadir Budayuni : Muntakhab-ut-Tawarikh, E.D., V.
Abd-ul-Wali : The Mohammedan Castes of Bengal.
Abdur Rahim, Sir : The Principles of Muhammadan Jurisprudence. London, 1911.
Abd-ur-Razzaq : Narrative of a Voyage to India, tr. from the French by R. H. Major, India in the Fifteenth Century. London, 1857.
Abu'l-Anwar : The Moslem Festivities. Calcutta, 1892.
Abu'l-Fazl 'Allami : 'A'in-i-Akbari, III. (Persian): and tr. H. S. Jarret. Calcutta, 1894.
Akbar-namah, E.D., VI.—ed. Ahmad 'Ali and Abd-ur-Rahman, 3 vols. Calcutta, 1877-86.
Abu'l-Wafa Thana Allah : Risala Ahl-i-Hadith. Amritsar. No date.
Abu Talib : History of Asaf-ud-Dawlah.
Aga Khan, H. H. The : The Memoirs of Aga Khan. Cassell & Co., London, 1954.
Aghnides, Nicholas P. : Mohammedan Theories of Finance, New York, 1916.
Ahmad Husain, Sir : Notes on Islam, Hyderabad.
Ahmad, K. A. : The Founder of Pakistan, London, 1942.
Aitken, E. A. : The Gazetteer of Sind. Karachi, 1907.
Aiyangar, S. K. : South India and her Muhammadan Invaders. Oxford, 1921.

- Al-Baladhuri : Kitab Futuh-ul-Buldan, ed. M. J. deGoeje, Leyden, 1866.
- Al-Biruni : India, tr. E. C. Sachau, 2 vols. London, 1888.—E.D.
- Al-Utbi : Ta'rikh-i-Yamini, E.D., I.
- Ali Muhammad Khan : Mir'at-i-Ahmadi, tr. James Bird, The History of Gujarat. London, 1835.
- Ali, C. Rahmat : The Millat of Islam and the Menace of Indianism, Cambridge Univ. Press, 1942.
- Ambedkar, B. R. : Thoughts on Pakistan, Bombay, 1941.
- Amir Khusru : Ta'rikh-i-Ala'i, E.D., III.
- Ansari, Shaukat Ullah : Pakistan—The Problem of India. Lahore, 1944.
- Arnold, Sir Thos. W. : The Preaching of Islam, The Westminster Press, London, 1896.
- — : The Caliphate, Oxford University Press, 1924.
- Babur. (The Emperor) : Waqi'at-i-Baburi, E.D.
- Baillie N. B. E. : A Digest of Moohummudan Law, Hani-fee'a and Imameea, 2 volumes. London, 1875.
- Bains, Sir A. : Ethnography: The Castes and Tribes of India. Strassburg, 1912.
- Bakhtawar Khan : Mirat-i-'Alam, E.D. VII.
- Banninga, J. J. : The Moplah Rebellion of 1921 Art, in The Moslem World, Vol. xiii, p. 379, New York, 1923.
- Bernier, F. : Travels in the Mogul Empire, tr. Constable, 2nd ed. by V. A. Smith, Oxford, 1914.
- Blochmann, H. : Introduction to the A'in-i-Akbari, Calcutta, 1872-77.
- Boer, T. J. de : The History of the Philosophy of Islam. London, 1903.
- Brown, W. Norman : The United States, India and Pakistan. Harvard University Press, Cambridge, Mass. 1953.
- Browne, E. G. : Persian Literature in Modern Times, Cambridge, 1924.
- Buckler, F. W. : A New Interpretation of Akbar's Infallibility Decree of 1579, Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 1924, p. 59 of.
- Chatelier, A. Le : The Aga Khan, R.M.M., 1, 48.
- Chiragh 'Ali, Maulvi, Reforms Under Muslim Rule, Bombay, 1883.
- Cousens, H. : Bijapur and its Antiquities, Bombay, 1916.

- Crooke, W. : An Introduction to the Popular Religion and Folklore of Northern India. Allahabad, 1894.
 Popular Religion and Folklore of North India, 2 vols., Westminster, 1896.
 Tribes and Castes of the Northwest Provinces and Oudh, 4 vols. Calcutta, 1896.
 Natives of Northern India, London, 1907.
- Dara Shikuh : Majma'-ul-Bahrayn, tr. and pub. Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta, 1929.
- Davis, Kingsley : The Population of India and Pakistan. Princeton University Press, Princeton, New Jersey.
- Diya-ud-Din Barani : Ta'rikh-i-Firuz Shahi, E.D., III.
- Donaldson, Dwight M. : The Shi'ite Religion. Luzac & Co. London, 1933.
- Douglas, J. : Bombay and Western India, 2 vols. London, 1893.
- Dumasia, N. M. : A Brief History of the Agha Khan. Bombay, 1903.
- Duncan, J. : The Coast of Malabar, in the Asiatic Review, V.
- Elphinstone, Monstuart : The History of India. 6th ed. London, 1874.
- Elliot, Sir H. M. : Races of the North-West Provinces of India, 2 vols. London, 1869.
- Elliot, Sir H. M. and Dawson, J. : The History of India as told by Its Own Historians, 8 vols. London, 1867-77.
- Fanshawe, H. C. : Delhi, Past and Present. London, 1902.
- Farquhar, J. N. : An Outline of the Religious Literature of India. Oxford, 1920.
 —, Modern Religious Movements in India. Macmillan, New York, 1915.
- Firishtah : Ta'rikh-i-Firishtah, tr. Briggs, 4 vols. London, 1829.
- Firuz Shah, Emperor : Futuhat-i-Firuz Shahi, E.D., III.
- Gait, E. A. : A History of Assam, Calcutta, 1906.
- Ghulam Ahmad Khan : Majmu'ah-i-Malfuzat-i-Khwajagan-i-Chisht. Delhi A.H. 1324.
- Goldziher, I. : Vorlesungen uber den Islam, Heidelberg, 1910; and tr. by K. C. Seelye. New Haven, Yale Univ. Press, 1917.
- Graham, Lieut.-Col. G. : The Life and Work of Syed Ahma Khan. Edinburgh, 1885.

- Gribble, J. D. B. : A History of the Deccan, 2 vols. London, 1896.
- Gul Badan Begam : Humayun-namah (A History of Humayun), Tr. A. S. Beveridge. London 1902.
- Haig, Sir Wolseley : The Cambridge History of India, III. Turks and Afghans. Cambridge, 1928.
- — : The Religion of Ahmad Shah Bahmani, J.R.A.S., 1924, 73f.
- Har Bilas Sarda : Ajmir, Historical and Descriptive, Ajmir.
- Hasan Nizami : Taj-ul-Ma'athir, E.D., I.
- — : " " , E.D., II.
- — : Hindustan ke do Paigambar, Ram-o-Krishan, Lahore, A.H. 1325.
- Herklots, G. A. : Islam in India, ed. W. Crooke, Oxford, 1921.
- Hollister, John N. : The Shi'a of India. Luzac & Co., London, 1953.
- Horovitz, J. : Epigraphia Indo-Moslemica. Calcutta.
- — : Monograph on the Da'irewale Sect.
- Horten, Dr. M. : Indische Stromungen in der Islamischen Mystik. I. Zur Geschichte und Kritik. Heidelberg, 1927.
- Hughes, T. P. : A Dictionary of Islam, London, 1885.
- Hunter, W. W. : The Indian Musulmans, London, 1871.
- Ibbetson, Sir D. : Outlines of Punjab Ethnography.
- Ibn Athir : Kamil-ut-Tawarkih, E.D. II.
- Ibn Batutah : Travels in Bengal and China and the Way Thither, 4 vols., London, 1915.
- India Government Publications : Census of India, 1951— Paper No. 1, 1952; Paper No. 2, 1953.
- The Constitution of India, 1949, Central Book Depot, Allahabad.
- Ivanow, Wladimir : Descriptive Catalogue of the Persian Manuscripts in the Collection of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, 3 vols. Calcutta, 1924-27.
- Jadunath Sarkar : Mughal Administration.
- Jahangir, Emperor : Waq'at-i-Jahangiri, E.D., VI.
- Jawahar : Tadhkirat-ul-Wai'at. Private Memoirs of the Emperor Humayun, tr. Major Chas. Stewart. London, 1832.
- Jones, L. Bevan : The People of the Mosque. Association Press, Y.M.C.A., Calcutta. 1932.

- Jones, V. R. and L. Bevan : Woman in Islam. The Lucknow Publishing House, Lucknow, 1941.
- Kamal-ud-Din, Khwajah : The Sources of Christianity, Unwin Bros., London, 1924.
- Karim Ghulam Ali : An Open Letter to H.H. the Agha Khan, Karachi, 1927.
- Keene, Henry G. : The Turks in India. London, 1879.
- Khafi Khan : Muntakhab-ul-Lubab, E.D. VII.
- Khaja Khan : Studies in Tasawwuf. Madras, 1923.
- Kohndkar Fazl-i-Rabbi : The Origin of the Musulmans of Bengal, Calcutta, 1895.
- Khuda Bakhsh, S. : Essays, Indian and Islamic.
- Lane-Poole, S. : Medieval India Under Moslem Rule, 12th ed. Fisher Unwin. London, 1917.
- Law, N. N. : The Promotion of Learning during Moham- medan Rule. London, 1916.
- Leyden, J. : The Rosheniah Sect, A.R., XI.
- Macauliffe, M. A. : The Sikh Religion, 6 vols. Oxford, 1909.
- Mahbub Rizwi, Sayyid : Ta'rikh Deoband, Ashok Press, Delhi. (Persian Urdu.) 1372 A.H.
- Malik Muhammad Din : The Gazetteer of the Bahawalpur State, Lahore, 1904.
- Manucci, N. : Storia do Mogor, ed. and tr. Wm. Irvine. Abridged. London, 1913.
- Meer Hassan Ali, Mrs. : Observations on the Mussulmans of India. ed. W. Crooke. Oxford, 1917.
- Menant, D. : Les Bohoras du Guzarate, R.M.M., X, 465 ff. Les Khodjas du Guzarate, R.M.M., XII, 21 ff.
- Minhaj as-Siraj Juzjani : Tabaqat-i-Nasiri, E.D., II.
- Mirza Ghulam Ahmad : The Teachings of Islam. London, 1910.
- Mirza Muhammad Hadi : Nur Allah Shustari, Shahid-i-Thalith. Lucknow, 1925. (Urdu, Compiled.)
- Mirza Muhammad Kazim : Ta'rikh-i-Kachh-o-Makran, Moradabad, 1905.
- Morrison, Theodore : The History of the M.A.-O. College, Aligarh, Allahabad, 1903.
- Muhammad Ali, Maulana : A Scheme of Studies for the National Muslim Educational Institutions in India, Bombay, 1921.

- Muhammad Ali, Maulvi: Translation and Commentary: The Holy Qur'an, 2nd ed. Lahore, 1920. Ahmadiyya Anjuman-i-Ishaat-i-Islam.
- Muhammad Aslam: Tabaqat-i-Nasiri, E.D., VIII.
- Muhammad Hafiz Allah as-Soroni: Guldastah-i-Gulshan-i-Faqiri, pt. i, A.H. 1309.
- Muhammad 'Inayat Allah Khan: Tadhkirah, Vol. I. Amritsar, 1924.
- Muhammad Iqbal, Sir: Asrar-i-Khudi, tr. R. A. Nicholson. London, 1920.
- Muhammad Isma'il: Sirat-ul-Mustaqim. Delhi. No date. (Urdu)
- Muhammad Kazim: Alamgir-namah, E.D., VII.
- Muhammad Yasin: Halat-i-Sabir. Moradabad, 1910.
- Muir, Sir William: The Annals of the Early Caliphate. London, 1883.
- —: The Caliphate, Its Rise, Decline and Fall. Edinburgh, 1915.
- Najm-ul-Ghani Khan: Madhahib-ul-Islam. Newul Kishore Press, Lucknow, 1924.
- —: Da'udi Bohron ki Ta'rikh. Moradabad, 1914.
- Nicholson, R. A. : The Mystics of Islam. London, 1914. Studies in Islamic Mysticism. Cambridge, 1921.
- Ni'mat Allah: Ta'rikh-i-Jahan Lodi, E.D., V.
- Nizam-ud-Din Ahmad: Tabaqat-i-Akbari, E.D., V.
- Nur Allah Bin Sharif al Husayni al Mar'ashi Shustari: Majalis-ul-Mu'minin, MS. in the Asiatic Society of Bengal Library. Calcutta. (Arabic)
- O'Leary, De Lacy: Arabia Before Muhammad. Routledge, Kegan Paul, London.
- Pakistan Government Publications: Census of Pakistan, 1951—Census Bulletins Nos. 1 and 2, Govt. of Pakistan Press. The Struggle of a Nation, Govt. of Pakistan Press, Karachi.
- The Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan. Government of Pakistan Press, Karachi, 1956.
- Five Years of Pakistan, Pakistan Publications, Karachi.
- Rahman 'Ali: Tadhkirah-i-'Ulama-i-Hind, 2nd ed. Lucknow, 1914.
- Risley, H. H.: The Tribes and Castes of Bengal, 2 vols. Calcutta, 1891.

- Rose, H. A. : A Glossary of Tribes and Castes of the Punjab and North-West Frontier Province, 3 vols. Lahore, 1911-19. I.
- Roy, Sripati C. : Customs and Customary Law in British India. Calcutta, 1911.
- Sayyid 'Asghar Husayan : Hayat-i-Shaykh-ul-Hind. Deoband, no date.
- Sell, E. : The Religious Orders of Islam. C.L.S., Madras, 1908.
- — : The Khalifate Agitation in India. C.L.S., Madras, 1922.
- Sen, D. C. : History of Bengali Language and Literature. Calcutta, 1911.
- Shams-i Siraj 'Afif : Ta'rikh-i-Firuz Shahi, E.D., III.
- Shaykh Zayn-ud-Din : Tuhfat-ul-Mujahidin, tr. Rowlandson (part only).
- Shihab-ud-Din Abu'l-'Abbas Hamid : Masalik-ul-Absar fi Mamalik-ul-Amsar E.D., III.
- Smith, Wilfred C. : Modern Islam in India. Victor Gollancz, London, 1946.
- Sprenger, A. : Catalogue of the King of Oudh MSS. Calcutta, 1854.
- Sultan Muhammad Shah, H.H. The Agha Khan : India in Transition, London, 1918.
- Syed Ahmad Khan, Sir : Essays on the Life of Mohammad. London, 1869. The Mohammedan Commentary on the Holy Bible. I. Ghazipur, 1862. II, Aligarh, 1865. (Incomplete, Urdu-English.)
- Syed Amir 'Ali, The Rt. Hon. : The Spirit of Islam, or The Life and Teachings of Muhammad. London, 1891.
- Syed Mahmud : A History of English Education in India. Aligarh, 1895.
- Symonds, Richard : The Making of Pakistan. Faber and Faber, London, 1949.
- Tassy, J. H. Garcin de : Histoire de la litterature hindoue et hindoustanie, 3 vols., 2nd ed. Paris, 1870.
- — : Memoire sur les Particularites de la Religion musulmane dans l'Inde. Paris, 1831.
- Thurston, E. : The Castes and Tribes of Southern India. Madras, 1909.
- Unknown Author : Chach-namah, E.D., I.

- Vairanapillai, Dr. Samuel : Are We Two Nations ? Hima & Co., Maratha House, Kodaikanal, India, 1948.
- Walter, H. A. : The Ahmadiya Movement. Association Press, Calcutta, 1918.
- Williams, L. F. Rushbrook : India in 1920. Government of India Press, Calcutta, 1921.
- The Indian Khilafat Delegation Publications. Nos. I—VII. London, 1920.
- Zwemer, S. M. : Animism in Islam. S.P.C.K., London, 1920.
- Zulfiqar 'Ali Khan, Sir : The Poetry of Iqbal. Lahore, 1922.

II. Supplementary Reference Books

- Encyclopedia of Islam, The : 4 vols. and Supplement. Luzac & Co., London (First Edition).
- Indian Year Book, The : Times of India Press, Bombay. Since 1914.
- Jam'ia Millia Islamia, Aligarh, 1923 ; and Jam'ia Nagar, New Delhi, 1951-1952. Annual Reports.
- Osmania University, Hyderabad : Prospectus, 1919 and 1955.

III. Government Publications

- Bombay, Gazetteer, The : Bombay, 1877-1904.
- Census of India Reports : 1891, 1901, 1911, 1921, 1931, 1941, 1951. Govt. of India Press, Delhi.
- Census of Pakistan : 1951. Manager of Publications, Karachi, 1952.

IV. Periodicals

- Henry Martyn School Bulletin, Aligarh, Oct.-Nov. 1954, p. 5.
- Islamic Review : (monthly). Woking, England.
- Moslem World and the U.S.A., Jan., 1955.
- Muslim Outlook, The : Lahore, April, 1924. Art. by Nawab Hisam-ul-Mulk.
- Muslim World, The : April., 1955. Stanley E. Brush, Ahmadiyyat in Pakistan, pp. 145-171.
- Notes on Islam, Calcutta : Sept., 1952, pp. 102-105 ; Mar., Dec., 1955.

Pakistan News Release, Pakistan House, London. July 31, 1956.

Review of Religions, The : Monthly. Rabwah, Pakistan. (Quadiani).

Statesman, The : Calcutta, 11 Feb., 1937. Letter from Sir Muhammad Yaqub.

GLOSSARY OF ISLAMIC TERMS

'ABBĀSID. The name of a dynasty of khālīfahs (caliphs), descended from al-'Abbās, paternal uncle of the Prophet, which succeeded the Ummayyad dynasty of Damascus, and ruled at Baghdad from A.D. 749 to A.D. 1258. This dynasty was overthrown by the Mongols under Hūlāgū.

ADHĀN. The call to public prayer (salāt or namāz) proclaimed by the Mu'adhhdhin (crier) from the mosque.

'ĀDIL. Lit. 'one who dispenses justice'. A title for a common law judge.

AGHA KHAN. The title of the head of an extensive and scattered branch of the Ismā'īlians, which in India is known as the Khojahs. He is a resident of Bombay.

AHADITH. Plural form of hadith (tradition), q.v. :

AHL-I-HADITH. See Wahhābī.

AHL-I-KHIDMAT. Lit. 'the people of service'. A class of inmates in a khānaqāh (monastery) of darwīshes.

AHL-I-KHILWAT. Lit. 'the people of retirement or privacy', i.e. the recluses, the most advanced class of inmates of a khānaqāh (monastery).

AHL-I-QUR'ĀN. A sect with extreme Wahhābite tendencies, founded in the Punjab in 1902 by 'Abd Allāh Chakrālāwī.

AHL-I-SUHBAT. Lit. 'the people of society', a class of darwīshes among the inmates of a khānaqāh (monastery).

AHL-UL-KITĀB. Lit. 'people of the book', i.e. those to whom a divine revelation by means of Scripture has been given : Jews, Christians, and Sabeans.

AHMADIYAH. The name of a modern Indian sect, founded in the year 1889, at Qadian, in the Punjab, by Mīrzā Ghulām Ahmad.

AJLAF ZĀT (DHĀT). The technical term meaning low caste.

AKHBĀR. Plural of khabar (news). The common term for newspaper.

AKHLĀQ. Morals, ethics.

AMRĪYAH. The title given to the commander-in-chief of the pre-Mughul Muslim army of the Delhi government.

ANJUMAN. A society or association.

'AQĪDAH. Plural, 'aqā'id. A creed or belief.

'AQIQAH. A custom observed by Muslims after the birth of a child (in India any time up to seven years of age or more), when the hair is shaved and goats or sheep are sacrificed; in some parts, two animals for a boy and one for a girl.

ĀZĀD. Free. A term applied to those darwishes or faqirs who are anti-nomians, and do not regard themselves as bound to observe the Law (Shari'at) of Islam.

BAQĀ. Continuance, i.e. of the personality in or with Allāh. A Sūfī doctrine connected with that of fanā (absorption) fi Allāh (in God).

BA-SHAR'. According to or with the Law (Shari'at) of Islam. A term applied to those darwishes who regulate their lives according to the Shari'at (Law) of Islam.

BĀTINĪ. Esoteric, having an inner or hidden meaning.

BERĀ. A raft. The name of the festival of Khwājah Khidr, celebrated in India by setting little rafts afloat on a stream in the name of Khwājah Khidr, on which have been placed lights, flowers, fruits, sweetmeats, and other eatables.

BE-SHAR'. Without the Law (Shari'at) of Islam. A term applied to those darwishes who are anti-nomians, and who regard themselves as not bound to follow the Shari'at (Law) of Islam.

BIHISHTI. Lit. 'a heavenly one'. A euphemistic term applied to the Muslim water-carrier of India.

BOHRAH. Also spelled Bohorā. The name of an Ismā'īlī Shī'ah sect, found chiefly in Bombay and Baroda.

BURŪZ. A coming forth, appearance, or manifestation. The term used by Mizrā Ghulām Ahmad, of Qadian, to describe his relation to Muhammad the Prophet.

CHAMĀR. The name of an outcaste group of Hindus who work in leather (chamrā).

CHAUKĪDĀR. A watchman. The name or title of a petty police officer of an Indian village.

CHELĀ. A disciple of a Hindu ascetic.

CHERŪMAN. An agricultural labouring caste on the Malabar coast.

CHIRĀGH. A lamp or light.

CHISHTĪYAH. The name of the darwish order which was introduced into India by Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī, the saint of Ajmīr.

DĀBIR. 'A secretary.' An officer who supervised the arrangements for travellers, ambassadors, and men of letters at the Court at Delhi in pre-Mughul days.

DĀ'Ī. This title literally means 'one who calls', i.e. to the true faith, hence a 'missionary'. It is used in this sense by the Ismā'ilian sects, notably the Bohrahs, Khojahs, and Quarmaṭians.

DĀ'IRAH. A circle or circuit.

DARGĀH. A shrine or tomb of a saint which usually is an object of worship and pilgrimage.

DĀR-UL-HĀRB. 'The Abode of War'. A term used by Muslims with reference to a country belonging to infidels which has not been brought under the rule of Islam.

DĀR-UL-ISLĀM. 'The Abode of Islam.' A country where the Law (Sharī'at) of Islam is in full force.

DĀR-UL-KHILĀFAT. The east of the caliphate.

DĀR-UL-'ULŪM. 'The Abode of the Sciences.' A name applied to an Arabic madrasah where the Islamic 'sciences' are taught.

DARWĪSH. A religious mendicant. Lit. 'one who goes from door to door'. The darwīsh is also called a faqīr.

DHĀT. The essence of a thing; in theology it is used of the essence of Allah. In India it is used to mean 'caste', and is pronounced 'zāt', which see.

DHIKR. Lit. 'remembering', i.e. remembering Allah. It is the religious ceremony which is practised by the various religious orders of faqīrs or darwīshes.

DHIMMĪ. A non-Muslim subject of a Muslim government who, for the payment of a poll-tax (jizyah), is guaranteed the security of his person and property in a Muslim country.

DHOBĪ. An Indian washerman.

DĪN. The Islamic word for 'Religion', particularly for the religion of the prophets.

DIWĀLI. Lit. 'a row of lamps'. A Hindu festival at which the houses and streets are illuminated, and the night is spent in gambling.

DIWĀN. The chancellor of the exchequer of the Mughuls.

DRŪZES. An heretical sect of Muslims which arose, about the beginning of the eleventh century A.D., in the Syrian mountains. They are still found in the Lebanon mountains and near Damascus.

FANĀ. Extinction, or absorption of the personality of the mystic in Allāh. It is the final stage in the journey of the sūfī.

FAQUIR. Lit. 'poor', in the sense of being poor in spirit, or in need of the mercy of Allah. The term is used of those who are members of religious (darwīsh) orders.

FARḌ. That which is obligatory. A term used of those rules and ordinances of Islam which are held to have been established by Allah Himself, as distinguished from those which are based on the precept or example of the Prophet, and which are called sunnah.

FĀTIḤAH. The name of the first Sūrah of the Qur'ān.

FĀTIMIDS. The dynasty of caliphs (khalīfahs) which ruled over Egypt and North Africa (A.D. 908-1171), and which claimed descent from Faṭimah, the daughter of the Prophet and 'Alī.

FATWĀ. A legal decision in Islam based on the Shari'at, given by the Khalīfah, a muftī or a ādī.

FIKR. The religious meditation of a Muslim mystic.

FIQH. The branch of Muslim knowledge or 'science' which deals with Muslim law (Shari'at).

GHĀZĪ. A hero, a warrior. One who fights in the cause of Islam.

HADITH. Plural Aḥādīth. Lit. 'a saying'. The technical term used by Muslims to indicate the authoritative collections of Traditions. They are records of what Muhammad did, what Muhammad enjoined, and that which was done in his presence which he did not forbid. Sunnīs and Shī'ahs have separate collections of Ḥadīth. The best known are the Ṣiḥāḥ-us-Sittah (The Six Correct Collections) of the Sunnīs. These are the collections of:

1. Muhammad Isma'il al-Bukhārī, A.H. 256.
2. Muslim Ibn-ul-Ḥajjāj, A.H. 261.
3. Abū 'Īsā Muhammad at-Tirmidhī, A.H. 279.
4. Abū Dā'ūd as-Sajistānī, A.H. 275.
5. Abū 'Abd-ir-Rahmān an-Nasā'ī, A.H. 303.
6. Abū 'Abd-Alāh Muhammad Ibn Mājah, A.H. 273.

HADRAT. Lit. 'presence'. A title of respect which is the equivalent of 'your honour', or 'his honour'; when applied to holy persons it may be said to have the meaning 'your reverence', or 'his reverence'.

HĀJĪ. A person who has performed the pilgrimage (hajj) to Mecca. It is also used as an honorific title for one who has performed the hajj.

HĀJJ. The pilgrimage to Mecca, which occurs annually in the month of Dhī'l-Ḥijjah, the twelfth month of the Muslim calendar.

HĀL. Lit. 'state or condition'. A term used among darwishes to indicate the 'state', or ecstasy, attained by the mystic who induces it by the auto-hypnotic process of dhikr.

HALQAḤ. A circle or circuit. It refers to the circuit of villages to which the member of a darwish brotherhood is appointed for the purpose of collection of gifts for the khānaqāh (monastery) with which he is connected.

HANAḤĪ. A follower of the Sunnite legal school, founded by Abū Ḥanīfah, (d. A.H. 150).

HAQĪQAḤ. The final knowledge of things, as they are in Allāh, to which the Sūfī attains in the last stage of the mystic journey.

HARBĪ. From harb, meaning 'war'. A person of an infidel country who has not been subjected to a Muslim government, and who does not pay the poll-tax (jizyah), which those who have been conquered (dhimīs) pay.

HIBAḤ. A legal term used for a gift of property.

HIDDEN IMĀM. The twelfth imām of the Ithnā 'Ashariyah Shī'ahs, Muhammad, son of Ḥasan al-'Askarī, who is so called because the Shī'ahs believe that he is still alive but has been divinely 'hidden' for a time, and will appear again in the last days as the Mahdī.

HĪJRAḤ, or HĪJRAT. Lit. 'migration'. It has three common usages: (1) The departure of Muhammad from Mecca to Medina; (2) The Muslim era; (3) the act of a Muslim leaving a country under infidel rule where it is impossible for the provisions of the Sharī'at in respect to religious duties to be carried out.

HĪMĀYAT. Support, assistance, protection, e.g. Anjuman-i-Ḥimāyat-i-Islam (the society for the protection or assistance of Islam).

'IBĀDAT. Lit. 'service'. A term used for 'worship' in Islam, which connotes the 'service' of the 'abd' (slave) rendered as a thing due to Allāh, his Master.

'ĪD. Festival. There are two 'Īds in Islam of universal importance: the 'Īd-ul-Fiṭr, celebrated at the close of the Fast of Ramadān, and the 'Īd-ud-Duhā, or Baqarah 'Īd, celebrated on the tenth day of Dhi'l-Hijjah, and is a part of the rites of the Mecca pilgrimage also. Outside every Muslim town or city one will find an 'Id-gāh (lit. festival-place), where the 'Id prayers are said at the time of these festivals.

IJMĀ'. One of the four foundations (uṣūl) of Islam. It signifies the collective or unanimous agreement of the learned doctors of the Muslim community, in any matter of the interpretation of Islamic principles.

IJTIHĀD. lit. 'exertion'. The opposite of ijmā', as it expresses the idea of a 'logical deduction' on a legal or theological question by a single learned Islamic doctor or divine.

ILĀHĪ. Divine. Pertaining to Allāh (God).

ILHĀM. Divine inspiration or revelation in the subjective sense.

'ILM. Knowledge.

'ILM-UL-GHAYB. Knowledge of the hidden things, or mysteries.

'ILM-UR-RAML. Lit. 'knowledge of the sand'. The art of geomancy, a form of magic.

IMĀM. Lit. 'one who goes before'. One whose leadership or example is to be followed. (1) The prayer-(namāz, ṣalāt) leader of a mosque. (2) The Imām, or Khalīfah (Caliph) of the Muslim people. (3) The leader of any system of theology or law, e.g. Imām Abū Ḥanīfath, or Imām Al-Ghazālī. (4) The Shī'ahs also apply the term to the leaders of their sect.

IMĀM-BĀRAH. Lit. 'the enclosure of the Imāms'. A building in which the festival of the Muharram is celebrated, and in which is held the service in commemoration of the deaths of 'Alī and his sons, Ḥasan and Ḥusayn. The most noted one in India is that of Āṣaf-ud-Daulah, at Lucknow.

IMĀMĪ. Lit. 'a follower of the Imām'. A follower of the chief sect of the Shī'ahs, i.e. those who follow the twelve Imāms, hence called the Ithnā 'Ashariyah (the Twelvers).

IMĀM-UZ-ZAMĀN. Lit. 'the leader of the time'. A term applied by the Bohrahs and Khojahs to those whom they have recognized as their leaders since the concealment of their seventh Imām. Hence the Āghā Khāṇ is the present Imām-uz-Zamān of the Khojahs.

ĪMĀN. Faith. The doctrines held by Muslims expressed in the six articles of the Muslim creed or belief: (1) in Allāh; (2) in Angels; (3) in Books revealed by God; (4) in the Prophets of God; (5) in the Day of Judgment; (6) in Predestination of man to good or evil.

INSĀN-UL-KĀMIL. The perfect or ideal man. A term which Sūfīs use for one who combines in himself all the attributes of divinity and humanity.

ISHĀ'AT. Spread or propagation, as of Islam.

ISLĀM. 'Resignation or submission' to the will of Allāh. For the 'Faith' (Imān) of Islam, see Īmān. On the practical side Islam consists of five duties, which constitute Dīn: (1) Bearing witness (Shahādat) by the use of the kalimah (Lā ilāha illa Allāh, wa Muhammad-ur-Rasūl Allāh), 'There is no god but Allāh, and Muhammad is His Apostle'; (2) Reciting the five daily prayers (ṣalāt or namāz); (3) Giving the legal alms (zakāt); (4) Keeping the month's fast (ṣawm or rozah) of Ramadān; (5) Making the pilgrimage (hajj) to Mecca once in a lifetime.

ISMĀ'ILĪ. A follower of the Ismā'īliyah sect.

ISMĀ'ILĪYAH. A Shī'ah sect known as the Sab'iyyah (Sevensers), who hold that the Imāmate closed with Ismā'il, the son of the sixth Imām, Ja'far-as-Siddīq. They are variously subdivided. The two branches in India which belong to this sect are the Bohrahs and Khojahs.

ITHNĀ 'ASHARĪYAH. Lit. 'Twelvers'. The chief division of the Shī'ahs, which recognizes twelve Imāms, beginning with 'Alī, as successors of the Prophet. They regard the twelfth Imām, Muhammad, son of Hasan al-'Askarī, as the concealed or hidden Imām, who will ultimately appear in the last days as the Mahdī.

JABARŪT. One of the mystic stages of the Sūfīs, which signifies possession of power.

JALĪ. Perceptible, evident, clear. The opposite of khafī. A term used to describe a form of the dhikr, or ritual, practised by the darwīsh orders.

JAMA'AT. A congregation or collection of people.

JAMĀ'AT-KHANAH. An assembly hall or meeting house.

JĀMI‘MASJID. The large mosque of a city where the Muslim population is supposed to congregate to say the Friday prayers and hear the Friday sermon (khutbah), delivered by the preacher (khatīb). It is also called the Jum‘ah (Friday) mosque.

JAM‘ĪYAT. An association or conference, as the Jamī‘yat (conference)-ul-‘Ulamā (of the learned men)-i-Hind (of India).

JAZĪRAT-UL-‘ARAB. The peninsula of Arabia.

JIHĀD. ‘An effort, or striving’, i.e. in the interest of the spread of Islam. A religious or ‘holy’ war waged by a Muslim ruler or any group of Muslims against unbelievers.

JINN. Commonly known as ‘genii’. A species of creature believed in by Muhammad, which occupies a position between men and angels. Whereas angels were created of light, and men of earth, jinn were created of ‘smokeless fire’.

JIZYAH. The head or poll-tax, levied upon conquered peoples by a Muslim government to whom the protection of government has been extended.

JUZ. One of the thirty sections into which the Qur‘ān is divided, to enable the pious Muslim to recite the whole of the book in the month of Ramadān. It is also known as sīpārah.

KALIMAH. Lit. ‘a word’, i.e. the shortened form of the Muslim creed: Lā ilāha illa Allāh, wa Muhammad Rasūl Allāh (‘There is no God but Allāh, and Muhammad is the Apostle of God’).

KARĀMAT. Lit. ‘generosity, liberality’. A term used to refer to a miracle performed by a pīr (saint) through the ‘favour’ or ‘generosity’ of Allāh. The plural is karāmāt.

KHAFĪ. Imperceptible, hidden. The opposite of jalī; which see.

KHALĪFAH. A successor, viceregent or deputy. The Caliph of Sunnī Islam.

KHĀNAQĀH. A monastery of the darwish orders. Also called takyah.

KHĀNDĀN. ‘A family’. A term used to signify a darwish order, as the Chishti khāndān.

KHAN-I-SĀMĀN. Lit. ‘ruler of the property’. The title of the lord high steward of government property.

KHARĀJ. The land-tax due to a Muslim government.

KHATĪB. A preacher. One who delivers the Friday sermon (khutbah) at the mosque.

KHATM or KHATMAH. A recitation of the whole of the Qur'ān at one sitting.

KHATRAH. Plural, khatrāt. That which occurs to the mind. Used in a technical sense by the Sūfis to indicate divine illumination of the heart.

KHILĀFAT. The office of the Khalifah (Caliph). The Caliphate.

KHIL'AT. A robe of honour presented by a ruler to an inferior, as a mark of favour and distinction.

KHOJAHS. One of the Ismā'īlian sects of India, the leader of the chief branch of which is His Highness the Āgha Khān.

KHUTBAH. Lit. 'an address'. The sermon delivered on Fridays at the mosque at the time of the zuhr, or mid-day prayer.

KHWĀJAH. A gentleman; a respectable man. A title of honour or reverence prefixed to the name of a pīr (saint), as Khwājah Mu'in-ud-Dīn Chishtī.

LĀHŪT. 'Divine nature.' A term used for the last stage of the mystic journey of the Sūfī, which is absorption of individuality in Allāh.

LAYLAT-UL-QADR. 'The night of power or decree.' A night of the month of Ramadān the date of which is not now known. See Sūrat-ul-Qadr (xcvii) of the Qur'ān.

MADHHAB. 'A way, path.' Hence a religion. Plural, madhāhib.

MADRASAḤ. 'A place where teaching is done.' A school, particularly a school where the Islamic 'sciences' ('ulūm) are taught.

MAHDĀWĪ. A follower of the Mahdī.

MAHDĪ. Lit. 'The directed or guided one'. The eschatological belief of Muslims regarding the mighty one who will appear in the last days.

MAKTAB. 'A place where writing is taught.' The name given to the primary school commonly held in a mosque.

MALAKŪT. 'The nature of angels.' A stage of progress in the way of the Sūfī where one is said to attain to the nature of angels.

MANSŪKH. 'The cancelled one.' A term used for a verse or sentence of the Qur'ān or Ḥadīth which has been cancelled or abrogated by a later one.

MAQĀMĀT. Lit. 'stages'. The stages of the mystic journey of the Sūfī.

MARḤAM-I-'ĪSĀ. The ointment of Jesus. The ointment which the Ahmadīs of Qadian assert was used by the disciples to restore Jesus to life after he was taken down from the cross. An ointment by this name is prepared and sold by the followers of Mīrzā Ghulām Ahmad of Qadian.

MA'RIFAH. 'Knowledge', especially the gnosis of the Sūfī when in a state of ecstasy.

MASJID. Lit. 'a place of prostration', i.e. before Allāh. Hence a place of worship, a mosque.

MAULVĪ or MAWLAWĪ. A learned man, a graduate in theology.

MINĀR. A tower, as of a mosque, e.g. the Quṭb Minār of Delhi.

MUFTI. Lit. 'one who gives a legal decision', i.e. on the Muslim Shari'at (canon law). The title of a subordinate law officer who assists the qāḍī (judge.)

MUGHUL. The Arabic form of the word 'Mongol'. The term is erroneously applied to the Turkish dynasty founded at Delhi by Bābur, A.D. 1526, to distinguish it from the dynasty of the Ottoman Turks. It is a term also applied to one of the four chief social divisions of the Muslims of India. See Sharīf Zāt.

MUḤARRAM. Lit. 'that which is forbidden', hence anything sacred. (1) It is the name of the first month of the Muslim calendar. (2) It is the name of a festival observed particularly by Shī'ahs (though by many Sunnīs as well in India) during the first ten days of the month of Muharram, in commemoration of the martyrdom of Ḥusayn, who was the second son of Fāṭimah, the Prophet's daughter, by 'Alī.

MUḤTASIB. The public censor appointed by a Muslim ruler to hunt out and punish Muslims for neglecting the rites and prohibitions of their religion.

MUJADDID. Lit. 'a renewer'. There is a Muslim belief that in every century Allāh sends a person specially endowed with grace for the 'renewal' of the true faith, whose duty it is to sweep away the un-Islamic accretions, and initiate a widespread revival of true religion.

MUJTAHID. Lit. 'one who strives', i.e. to attain a high position of scholarship and learning. It is the highest degree conferred on Muslim divines.

MUKKUVĀN. A fisherman caste of the Malabar coast.

MULHID or MULĀHIDAH. Lit. 'one who has deviated or turned from the truth' of religion. A heretic.

MULLĀ. A learned man, a scholar.

MUQADDAM. Lit. 'the one who is placed first'. The head or chief of a village.

MURĪD. Lit. 'one who is desirous'. A disciple of a pīr, or murshīd of a darwīsh order.

MURJI. Lit. 'procrastinator'. One of the sect of Muslims who teach that the judgment of every true believer, who has committed a gunāh kabīrah (grievous sin), will be deferred till the Resurrection.

MURSHID. Lit. 'one who guides aright'. The title of the spiritual director of a darwīsh order. Also called pīr.

MUSHĀ'ARAH. An assemblage of poets (shu'arā) who meet for a contest of their poetical abilities.

MUSHRIK. Lit. 'one who joins' or gives associates to Allāh, hence a polytheist, an idolater.

MUSLIM. Lit. 'one who submits' to Allāh, hence a follower of the faith of Islam.

MUSTA'LIAN. A follower of the Ismā'īlian sect which accepts the right of Mustā'li rather than his brother Nizār to succeed his father, al-Muṣṭansir, the Fāṭimid Caliph of Egypt. The sect in India is represented by the Bohrahs; the Khojahs being the representatives of those who supported the claims of Nizār.

MU'TAZILAH. Lit. 'the separatists'. A rationalistic sect of Muslims, founded by Wāṣil ibn 'Aṭā, who 'separated' from the school of Ḥasan al-Baṣrī (A.H. 110).

NABĪ. A prophet.

NAFL. A voluntary act. A work of supererogation which is not demanded by the teaching of Muḥammad (fard or wājib) nor by his example (sunnah).

NAMĀZ. The Persian and common Indian Muslim term for prayer (ṣalāt) in its liturgical form.

NAQSHBANDĪYAH. A darwīsh (ascetic) order, founded by Khwajah Pīr Muhammad Naqshband.

NĀSIKH. Lit. 'The Cancellor'. A term used for a verse or sentence of the Qur'an or Ḥadīth which cancels or abrogates a previous one.

NĀSŪT. 'Human nature'. A term used by Sūfis to express the natural state of every man before he enters upon the mystic journey.

NAU-GAZĀ PĪR. The tomb or shrine of any legendary person supposed to have been of enormous height. The term signifies 'the nine-yard saint'.

NECHARĪ. 'Naturi', from Nature. The term is applied to Sir Syed Ahmad and his modernist followers, who emphasized the position that Islam was a religion according to Nature: the nature of man, and Nature in the scientific sense.

NEO-MU'TAZILITE. Another term used to describe the modern Indo-Muslim rationalists, like Sir Syed Ahmad, who in some ways resemble the Mu'tazilites of former times. See Mu'tazilah.

NIZĀRI. A follower of the sect of Ismā'īlians who regard Nizār as being the rightful successor to his father, al-Mustanṣir, Faṭimid Caliph of Egypt. Their representatives in India are the Khojahs. See Musta'lian.

PARDĀH. A curtain or veil. The term applied to the system of seclusion of Muslim women in India.

PATHĀN. Syn. AFGHĀN. The name of a tribe inhabiting the mountains north-west of Lahore; the name of a dynasty that ruled at Delhi; the name of one of the four major social divisions of the Muslims of India.

PĪR. An elder. A term used for a murshid (spiritual director) of a darwīsh order.

PĪR DASTGĪR. 'Guardian saint.' A title especially applied to the saint, 'Abd-ul-Qādir Jīlānī by the Muslims of the Punjab and the north-west, particularly Kashmir.

PĪRĪ-MURĪDĪ. The practice of making disciples (murīd) by spiritual preceptors, (pīr or murshid) of darwīsh orders.

PĪR-Ī-PĪRĀN. 'The saint of saints.' The title often given to the famous saint of Baghdad, 'Abd-ul-Qādir Jīlānī.

QADAM SHARĪF, or QADAM RASŪL, ALLAH. A slab of stone bearing an alleged footprint of the Prophet. Such 'relics' are very common in India.

QĀDI. A judge.

QĀDIRĪYAH. A darwish order founded by 'Abd-ul-Qādir Jilānī of Baghdad.

QĀDĪ-UL-QUDĀT. The chief justice.

QALANDAR. A common name for a Muslim ascetic. It is also the name of a darwish order, introduced into India by Abū (Bū) 'Alī Qalandar, whose tomb is at Panipat.

QALANDARIYAH. The name of the darwish order introduced into India by Abū 'Alī Qalandar. See Qalandar.

QARMATIAN, or QARMATĪ. An heretical sect of Muslims, allied closely to the Ismā'ilis some of whom, after expulsion from Egypt and Iraq, established themselves in Sind in the latter part of the ninth century A.D.

QUR'ĀN. Lit. 'the reading'. The name of the sacred book of the Muslims.

RAK'AH. 'A bowing.' A section of the Muslim prayers.

RAMADĀN. The ninth month of the Muslim calendar, during which a strict fast is observed from dawn until sundown.

RIBĀ. Usury. The taking of interest on loans, which is forbidden according to the Shari'at.

ROSHANĪYAH. The followers of one, Pīr Roshan, of Jullundur, in the Punjab, who founded an heretical sect on the frontier, beyond Peshawar, in the sixteenth century A.D. They are now almost extinct.

ROZAH. This is the Persian word for the Arabic Sawm, which means fasting.

SAB'ĪYAH. Lit. 'Sevens'. See Ismā'ilīyah.

SADR-Ī-JAHĀN. A title applied to the officer of the court at Delhi who was in charge of the lawyers and learned men ('ulamā).

SADR-US-SUDŪR. The title of an officer of the Muslim government at Delhi who was in charge of religious endowments and trusts (waqfs).

SAḤĪḤ. Lit. 'correct, sound'. A term applied to the six authoritative collections of Traditions (Aḥādith). See Hadith.

SAJJĀDAH NISHĪN. Lit. 'one who sits on the prayer rug'. A title applied to the living head of a darwish order or sub-order.

SALĀT. The term used throughout the Muslim world for the liturgical form of prayer which occurs five times a day. The common Persian term used in India is Namāz.

SĀLIK. Lit. 'a traveller'. A term used to describe one who has become a disciple (murīd) of a murshid (spiritual director) of a darwish order, and has started the journey on the mystic way of life.

SARĀ'Ī. A vulgar form of sarā. An inn, a temporary home for travellers.

SAYYĪD. Lit. 'lord, chief'. Any descendant of Muhammad. Also, one of the four, and chief, of the social divisions into which Indian Muslims are divided. See Sharīf Zāt.

SEVENERS. See Ismā'īlīyah; and Sab'iyah.

SHĀFI'Ī. One of the founders of the four legal sects of Sunnīs, whose whole name was Imām Muhammad ibn Idrīs ash-Shāfi'ī. Also a follower of the school of a sh-Shāfi'ī. In India they are found chiefly among the Mappillas of south India.

SHAHĪD. Lit. 'a witness'. One who dies as a martyr for the Muslim faith.

SHAR'AT. The canon law of Islam, including that which is based on the Qur'ān and the Traditions (Hadīth).

SHARĪF ZĀT (DHĀT). The noble, or high, castes in Indian Muslim society. These are four in number, and are stated in order of importance: Sayyid, Shaykh, Mughul, Pathān.

SHARQĪ. Eastern. A term applied to the 'eastern' kings of Jaunpur.

SHATTĀRIYAH. One of the darwish orders found in India.

SHAYKH. A term used to denote any one of the following: (1) an old man; (2) a man of authority; (3) a religious teacher; (4) the head of an order of darwishes; (5) one of the four chief social divisions among Indian Muslims. See Sharīf Zāt.

SHAYKH-UL-ISLĀM. A title given to an officer of the Muslim government at Delhi who was in charge of the darwishes and faqirs.

SHI'AH. Lit. 'the followers (of a person), or party'. Particularly the 'followers' of 'Alī, who, as first cousin of the Prophet, and husband of his daughter, Fātimah, regard him and his heirs as the rightful successors of the Prophet. See Ismā'īlīyah and Ithnā 'Asharīyah.

SHIRK. 'Joining, or associating', others with Allāh. Ascribing plurality to the deity. It is a common term for polytheism and idolatry.

ṢIḤR. Magic. A belief in the magical art.

SŪFĪ. A person who professes the mystic doctrines known as taṣawwuf, Islamic mysticism. See Darwīsh.

SŪFĪSM. The mystic doctrines, principles and practices (taṣawwuf) of Islamic mystics. A form of pantheism rooting in Hindu-Buddhist doctrines. The darwīsh orders are the natural result of the development of Sūfīism.

SUHRAWARDĪYAH. A name of one of the darwīsh orders found in India.

SUNNAH. Lit. 'a path or way; a manner of life'. A term which has become applied to the tradition which records either the sayings or doings of Muhammad.

SUNNĪ. Lit. 'one of the path'. A follower of Tradition. The term usually applied to the major sect of Muslims, who recognize the first four Khalīfahs as the rightful successors of Muhammad.

TABARRUK. Lit. 'that which brings a blessing'. A portion of the offering of food, flowers, or anything else, made to a saint's shrine; sacred relics.

TABLĪGH. Propaganda, particularly of the religious sort.

TAHDHĪB. Lit. 'purifying, cleaning'. Hence, reform, e.g. the magazine, Tahdhīb-ul-Akhlāq (The Moral Reformer).

TAKBĪR. The expression used by Muslims, Allāhu Akbar (God is very great).

TAKYAH. Lit. 'a pillow'. A monastery. See Khānaqāh.

TANZĪM. Lit. 'ordering, arranging'. A term of modern application used with reference to the movement in India for the economic, educational, and religious improvement of the condition of Indian Muslims. An essentially communal movement.

TAQĪYAH. Lit. 'guarding oneself'. A Shī'ah doctrine, whereby a Shī'ah believes he is justified in concealing his religious affiliation in order to avoid religious persecution.

TAQLĪD. Lit. 'winding round'. A term used in Muslim law to signify the following of a religious leader blindly or without due inquiry.

TARAQQĪ. Lit. 'gradual rising'. Hence, improvement, increase.

TA'RĪKH. Date, history. Plural, tawārīkh.

TARĪQAḤ. Lit. 'a path'. A term used by the Sūfīs for their special form of the religious life.

TASAWWUF. The term used to signify Islamic mysticism, or the doctrines and principles of the Sūfī. Syn. Sūfīism.

TASBĪH. A rosary of ninety-nine beads.

TAWBAH. Repentance.

TAWHID. The term used to express the unity of God, which is the great fundamental doctrine of Islam.

TA'WĪDH. Lit. 'to flee for refuge'. A charm or amulet used by Muslims.

TA'ZIYAH. Lit. 'a consolation'. A representation or model of the tomb of the martyr, Ḥusayn, at Karbala, which is carried in procession at Muharram time.

TWELVERS. See Ithnā 'Ashariyah.

'ULAMĀ. Plural of 'ālim, 'one who knows'. The learned doctors of Muslim society.

'UMAR. The name of the second Khalifah.

UMAYYAD. The name of the dynasty of Khalifahs which succeeded the fourth Khalifah, 'Alī, and reigned in Damascus from A.D. 661 to A.D. 749.

'URS. Wedding or marriage festivities. It has come to be used as a term for the ceremonies observed at the anniversary of the death of a saint (pīr or murshid).

USTĀDH. A preceptor, or teacher.

'UTHMĀN. The third Khalifah.

WAHHĀBĪ. A set of Muslim puritan revivalists, founded in the eighteenth century in Najd, Arabia, by Muhammad bin 'Abdul-Wahhāb. The sect is found in India under the name Ahl-i-Hadith.

WAHY. Revelation, or divine inspiration. A term used with special reference to the objective revelation of the Qur'ān. See Ilhām.

WĀ'IZ. Plural, wa'izīn. A preacher. A term of more general application than khatīb.

WAJD. Ecstasy. A term used by Sūfīs to indicate the state of divine illumination achieved by a traveller on the mystic path.

WALĪ. Plural, awliyā. One who is very near, i.e. to Allāh. A term used for saints or holy men.

WAQF. Lit. 'standing'. An endowment. Property which has been dedicated to charitable uses and the service of God.

WAṢĪ. 'An appointed guardian, executor of a will'. A term applied to 'Alī to indicate his legal right to be the Khalifah of Muhammad.

WAṢĪL. 'Meeting, union'. A Sūfī term, describing the stage of the mystic journey to Allāh where the sālik (traveller) sees the divine one face to face. It is the stage which immediately precedes fanā, or extinction of individuality, in the dhāt (essence) of Allāh.

YOGĪ. A Hindu ascetic.

ZAKĀT. The legal alms due from all Muslims who are free, sane, and adults.

ZANĀNAH. Derived from the Persian word zan (woman), and so is applied to the household of a Muslim, his wife or wives, and children, and the apartments which they occupy.

ZĀR. A crude, ritualistic service of exorcism, practised extensively in Muslim countries, particularly in Egypt.

ZĀT. See Dhāt.

ZIMMĪ. See Dhimmī.

ZIYĀRAT, or ZIYĀRAH. 'A visit'. A visit to the grave of the Prophet, or to the tomb of any Muslim saint. In India the term is used to denote the place of visitation, i.e. the tomb or shrine itself. This is true, particularly, in Kashmir.

ZUHD. Lit. 'religious devotion, renunciation of the world'. Asceticism.

INDEX

- 'Abbās, 57.
 'Abbāsids, 13, 56ff.
 'Abd Allāh, head of Quarmaṭians, 103.
 'Abd Allāh, Miyān, 114.
 'Abd Allāh, Shaykh, 111.
 'Abd Allāh Chakrālāwī, Maulvī, 197.
 'Abd-ul-'Azīz, Shāh, 188.
 'Abd-ul-Hamīd II, Sultān, 61.
 'Abd-ul-Latīf, Nawāb, 203, 206.
 'Abd-ul-Majīd, Caliph, 63.
 'Abd-ul-Quādir Budāyūnī, 94, 129, 137, 166.
 'Abd-ul-Quādir Jīlānī, 46, 124, 149.
 'Abd-un-Nabī, 166.
 'Abd-ur-Raḥīm, Sir, 72.
 'Abd-us-Salām, Aghā, 107.
 Abrogation, Doctrine of, 249ff.
 Abū Abdāl Chishtī, Khwājah, 124.
 Abū 'Alī Sindhī, 156.
 Abū Ḥanīfah, Imām, 29, 102.
 Abū 'l-Alā Maudūdī, Sayyid, 79.
 Abū'l-Faḍl, 97, 117, 132, 134, 166ff.
 Abū'l-Kalām Āzād, Maulānā, 217ff.
 Abū'l-Faṭḥ, Ḥakīm, 94.
 Academy of Islāmīc Studies, 272.
 Adam, 148, 257.
 Afghānistān, 4.
 Aghā Khān, H. H. the, 63, 108ff.
 — —; Press, Bombay, 110.
 Āgrā, 25, 65, 89, 98, 34, 95, 114.
 Ahl-i-Ḥadiṭh, 75, 195f.
 Ahl-i-Qur'ān, 75, 197f.
 Aḥmad, Mirzā Ghulām, 256ff., 115.
 Aḥmad, Sayyid, of Rae Bareli, 186ff., 115.
 Aḥmad Khān, Sir Syed, 200ff., 246.
 Aḥmadis, 256ff.
 Aḥmadiyah, 256ff.
 Aḥmadnagar, 91.
 Ājmir 42ff., 124.
 Akbar, 15ff., 34, 70f., 158ff., 160-68.
 Alamūt, 43, 10, 82.
 'Alā-ud-Din Khālji, 56f., 160.
 'Ali, the Caliph, 88, 97, 107.
 Aligārh, 99, 185, 204ff.
 Allāh, 138, 142f., 155f., 215.
 All-Pākistān Women's Ass'n., 237f.
 Altaf Hussain Hāli, 206.
 Allies, The, 62.
 Alrūr, 20.
 Alwār State, 135.
 Ambāla, 210.
 Amber, 25.
 America, 1, 266.
 Amir, 'Ali, The Right Hon. Syed, 63, 99, 247ff.
 Amir Ḥasan Dihlawī, 127.
 Amir Khusrū, 12, 23, 5, 139, 57.
 Amir Singh, 44.
 Amritsar, 173.
 Amriyah, 68.
 Amroha, 26, 96, 138, 147.
 Angora, 63, 99.
 Anhilwāra, 37.
 Ansāri, Dr. M. A., 217.
 Anti-Christ, The, 192, 264.
 Apostasy, 70.
 'Aqiqah, 146.
 Arabia, 1, 15, 17, 38, 103.
 Pre-Islāmīc, 255.
 Arabs, 37ff.
 in sind, 4, 19ff.
 Arhāi-Din-kā-Jhonprā, 56f.

- Arnold, Sir T. W., 29, 33, 36,
 56, 59, 161.
 Ārya Samāj, 210ff.
 Āṣaf 'Ali, Gov. of Orissa, 232.
 Aurangzib, 157f., 24f., 168f., 181.
 Al-Azhar University, 78.

 Bābur, 15f., 163f.
 Baghdad, 56f.
 Bahādur Shāh II, 61, 93.
 Baktāshī order, 135.
 al-Balādhurī, 9, 20, 41.
 Balūchistān, 2, 102.
 Bareilly Madrasah, 78.
 Baroda, 103.
 Bashīr-ud-Dīn Maḥmūd Aḥmad,
 Mīrzā, 267.
 Begam of Bhopal, Her Highness,
 85.
 Benares, 24f.
 Bengal, 44f., 172, 179.
 Bernier, 81, 151f.
 Be-shar' orders, 131f.
Bhagavad Gitā, 168f.
 Bhopāl, 163.
 Bible, The, 263f.
 Bihār, 68, 179ff.
 Bījāpūr, 90f.
 Bijnor, 122.
 Birbal, Rājā, 158, 163.
 al-Bīrūnī, 161f.
 Bohrahs, 103ff.
 Bombay, 8, 62, 100.
 Brahmans, 19f., 31f., 167f.
 Brazil, 1.
 British Government, 201f.
 British occupation: Effects of,
 199f.
 Budaun, 71, 125.
 Buddhism, 8, 45.
 influence on Sūfism, 155;
 monasteries, 154,
 Bukhārā, 42f.

 Cairo, 63, 78.
 Calcutta, 61, 84, 150.
 Caliph, The, 54ff.
 Caliphate, The, 55ff ;
 'abbāsīd, the, 56ff. ; agitation,
 61ff. ; Ottoman, 59ff. ;
 Turkish, 35, 99.
 Canada, 1
 Canon Law, Muslim, 9, 17, 76,
 186.
 Caspian Sea, 47, 92, 94.
 Caste among Muslims, 175ff.
 Cawnpore (Kānpūr), 52, 134.
 Central Asia, 7.
 China, 7.
 Chirāgh, 141f., 146.
 Chirāgh, 'Ali, Maulvi, 206.
 Chishtī order, 51, 124ff.
 Chitor, 25, 125.
 Christian critics of Islam, 245.
 Christianity, 87, 271f.
 Christians, 18, 20.
 Church, the Christian, 54.
 Colleges, Muslim, 76f.
 Communalism, 208f., 217.
 Constantinople (Istanbul), 61, 63
 Conversion to Islam, 6f., 19ff.,
 30ff., 43ff., incomplete, 170ff.
 Crooke, W., 145f.
 Crusades, The, 270.
 Customary law, 73, 175.
 Cutch, 46, 171.

 Dāhir, Rājā, 10f.
 Dā'irewāle, sect., 113f.
 Dā'is, Ismā'īlian, 100, 104.
 Damascus, 5, 37 ;—Medina
 Railway, 61, 68.
 Dārā Shikūh, Prince, 130, 167f.
 Dār-ul-Ḥarb, 17f., 185f.
 Dār-ul-Islām, 17f., 185ff.
 Dār-ul-Khilāfat, 59, 61.
 Dār-ul-'Ulūm, 76f.
 Darwish, 68f, 122f.
 Darwish orders, 118.
 Dā'ūdi Bohrahs, 104.
 Davis, Kingsley : Hinduism and
 Islam contrasted, 215.
 Debul, 10, 17, 19, 31, 64.
 Deccan, 6, 45f., 89.
 Delhi, 8, 23f., 56ff., 75ff., 92f.,
 124f. 133f., Unity Conference at, 35.
 Deoband, 78.
 Dhikr, 120ff, 156.

- Dhimmis, 12, 18ff., 27ff., 31, 157.
 Divorce, 240.
 Diwālī, 105, 164, 174.
 Drūzes, 102.
 Dūdhū Miyān, 49, 187f.
- Education, Aurangzib's criticism of, 81f.; traditional, 76-78.
 All-India Educational Conf., 235.
 Egypt, 57, 78, 83, 100, 101, 103, 121, 135.
 Elliot, Sir H.M., 31, 102.
 Elphinstone, Sir M., 5, 158.
 England,
 Muslim mission to, 268.
- Faqir, 131f.
 Farā'idī sect, 186-188.
 Farquhar, Dr. J. N., 180f.
 Fathpūr Sikri, 127, 141, 165.
 Fātiḥah, 141, 143.
 Fā'imah, 88, 176.
 Fā'imid Caliphate, 100, 103, 106.
 Fayḍi, 97, 164.
 Feminist movement, The, 237, 241.
 Fiqh, 76.
 Fire, The sacred, 167, 174.
 Firūz Shāh Tughluq, 24, 27f., 32f., 113f.
Futuḥ-i-Firūz Shāhī, 13, 24, 34.
- Gandhi, M. K.; 63.
 Ganges, 47, 101.
 Germany, 1-266.
 Ghāzipūr, 202ff.
 Ghazni, 23f.
 Ghulām Aḥmad, Mirzā, 115.
 God, 138, 155f., 246ff., 250ff.
 Gods, Hindu, 171.
 Goldziher, I., 153ff., 167.
 Gorakhpur, 174, 180.
 Great Britain, 1.
 Great War, The, 62,
 Gujarāt, 6, 43, 47, 128f., 135, 160.
 Gujranwālā, 133, 196.
 Gwalior, 68, 129.
- Ḥanafite, 95; law, 72, 75.
 Ḥarbis, 19, 27, 31.
 Ḥasan Nizāmi, Khawājah, 51, 65.
 Hejaz, 35.
 Hindu critics of Islam, 245.
 Hindu-Muslim beliefs contrasted, 105; marriages, 31, 39, 107, 159ff.; Unity of Akbar, 163ff.
 Hinduism: destruction of temples; 10ff.; idolatry, influence of Islam on; 179-183. Muslims' changing attitude, 35, 160ff., 174.
 Hindus, conversion of, 19ff., 30ff.
 Humāyūn, Emperor, 92, 129, 163, 174.
 Hunter, W. W., 45, 189ff.
 Ḥusayn Aḥmad Madini, Syed, 217.
 Hyderābād, Deccan, 61ff., H.E.H., the Niẓām of, 124, 190, 208.
- Ibn Sa'ūd, 75.
 'Īd-ul-Aḍḥā, 187; 'Īd-ul-Fiṭr, 187.
 Idolaters, 9, 18, 159.
 Ijtihād, 186, 196.
 Iltutmish, 12f., 55ff.
 'Imād-ud-Din Muhammad bin Qāsim, 9f., 28f., 31f., 157.
 Imām, 70f, 88, Mahdi, 113ff., 192.
 Imāmate, 89f.
 Indian Association, 216.
 , National Congress, 216.
 Infidels, 8, 11, 22.
 Inter-marriage, 31, 39, 159f., 171.
 Intolerance, 15ff.
 Iran, 1.
 Iraq, 3, 41, 101, 137.
 Islam, brotherhood of, 53.
 religion of, 44ff.
 and woman, 337ff.
 The New, 185ff.
 Islamic State, The, 15, 18, 66.
 Ismā'il, the 7th Imām, 89, 100, 108.
 Ismā'ilis, 43, 100f., 103f., 106, 111.
 Iṭhnā 'Ashariyah, 88f., 96f.

- Ja'far as-Şiddiq, Imām, 89, 100.
 Jahangir, Emperor, 125, 170, 174.
 Jains, 46.
 Jāmia Millia Islāmīa, 211ff.
 Jam'iyat-ul-'Ulamā-i-Hind, 75, 210.
 Jaunpur, 113, 194.
 Jesus Christ, 258ff, 264ff.
 Jihād, 14, 17f., 186, 189, 194.
 Jinn, 147.
 Jinnah, Muḥammad 'Ali, 220ff.
 Jizyah, 16ff., 27ff.
 Jodhpur, 25, 114.
 Judaism, 168, 216, 255, 262.
 Jullundur, 112.
 Jumna, river, 101, 139.

 Kabir, 180f.
 Kabirpanthis, 181f.
 Kābul, 111, 172.
 Kalimah, 34.
 Kamāl-ud-Din, Khawājah, 263, 267.
 Karāchi, 84.
 Karāmat 'Ali, 194ff.
 Kashmir, 122, 151, 159, 170, 172,
 Kemal Pasha, 63.
Khālifah, 55ff.
Khān Yār Street, Srinagar, 259.
Khānaqāh, 122, 144.
Khilāfat, 58ff., Committee, 62, 210.
Khojahs, 43f., 99f., 106ff.
Khudā Bakhsh, Prof. S., 206, 251f., 262.
Khuṭbah, 10, 55ff., 97.
Khyber Pass, 2, 3, 111.
 Konkan, The, 37, 41.
 Kṛishṇa, 169, 246, 260.

 Lahore, 6, 50, 71, 95, 178, 182; 197, 210, 222.
 Law, Muslim, 71-75ff., 105.
 Liāquat 'Ali Khān, 239
 — — —, Begam, 238.
 Low castes, conversion of, 39, 45, 51f.
 Lucknow, 65, 88, 93, 99, 145, 149.

 Madāri Order, 134, 136.
 Madras, 7, 40, 173, 204.
 Madrasahs, 76f., 80, 144, 204, 235, 266.
 Magians, 18, 20, 157.
 Magic, 147, 173.
 Maḥdawi doctrines, 112-115.
 Maḥdi 'Ali, Syed, (Muḥsin-ul-Mulk), 206.
 Maḥdi, Imām, 88, 113ff., 192.
 Maḥdi Movements, 113, 115, 192.
 Maḥmūd of Ghazni, 11, 21ff., 31f., 101, 161f., 144.
 Maḥmūdābād, Mahārājā of, 99, 93, 175.
 Makanpūr, Oudh, 134, 143.
 Malabār, 33, 37ff., 50, 63, 74.
 Malang order, 134, 136.
 Malkānās, 134, 171.
 Mansūkh, 249f.
 Mappillas, 37, 50, 63, 74.
 Maqāmāt, 119.
 Martyrs, Aḥmadi, 144, 262.
 Masjid, 65.
 Mecca, 23, 27, 83f., 113, 123, 248, 266.
 Medina, 23, 38, 44f., 83, 100, 124.
 Memons, 171.
 Messiah, The, 257ff.
 Minhāj-as-Sirāj, 23, 68, 102.
 Miracles, 140, 152, 249, 264.
 Missionaries, Muslim, 41-51.
 Missions, Christian, 210.
 Missions, Muslim, 50, 51, 210.
Mohammedan Commentary on the Holy Bible, 202.
 Mongols, 4, 56, 67, 77, 89, 198.
 Moplah Rebellion, 40, 63.
 Moradabad, 96, 138, 140, 149.
 Mosques, 64, 66, 67f., 101.
 Mughuls, The, 21, 198
 Muḥammad, the Prophet, 176, 190f.
 Muḥammad Aḥmad Saīd Khān, Nawāb of Chhatāri 204.
 Muḥammad 'Ali, Maulānā, 211.
 Muḥammad 'Ali, Maulvi, 255, 263, 267f.

- Muhammad Iqbāl, Sir, 178, 219, 251ff.
 Muhammad Qāsim Nanautvi, 78.
 Muhammad Shibli Nu'mani, 207f., 78.
 Muhammad Yā'qūb, Sir, 217f.
 Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental College, 204ff.
 ,, Educational Conference, 206.
 Muḥarram, 98ff.
 Mujaddid, 112.
 Mullāism, 78ff.
 Multān, 20f., 148f., 182.
 Murid, 119-122.
 Muslim Apologetic, The, 245ff.
 Muslim Foreign Missions, 268.
 Muslim idea of State and Church, 14, 15, 18, 66ff.
 Muslim invaders, 3-35.
 Muslim Ladies' Conference, All-India, 237.
 Muslim League, All India, 108, 209ff., 217ff.
 Muslim missionaries, 36ff.
 Muslim polemic, The, 245ff.
 Muslim Politics, 215ff., 233ff.
 Muslim population of India: 1. Pākistān: 222.
 Muslim Press, The, 242ff.
 Muslim rulers, intolerance of: 12-35, tolerance of: 14, 156-170.
 Muslim University, The, Aligarh, 99, 108, 204ff.
 See also Jāmiā Millia Islāmiā, 211ff.
 Muslim Women in India, 208f., in Pākistān, 237.
 Muslim World Congress, at Mecca, 86, 202.
 Al-Musta'li, Fāṭimid Caliph, 100, 103, 106.
 Al-Mustanṣir, Fāṭimid Caliph, 100, 103, 106.
 Mutiny, The, 200f., 203.
 Muttra (Mathura), 22, 25, 171.
 Mysore, 114, 175.
 Mysticism, (Sūfism) 116ff.
 Mystics, Islamic, 116ff.
 Nabī, 116.
 Nadwat-ul-'Ulamā, 207.
 Nānak, 181f.
 Naqshbandī order, 130f.
 National schools, 211.
 Nationalist movement, 218ff.
 Nature, 202.
 Nau-gazā pirs, 148f.
 Nau-roz, 100, 174.
 Nazir Ahmad, 207.
 Neo-Mu'tazilite, 246-262.
 New Saints, 150f.
 Nizām of Hyderabad, 124, 190, 208.
 Nizār, 100, 106.
 Noah, 146, 148.
 North Africa, 7, 17.
 N.W. Frontier Province, 7, 177, 195.
 Nūr Allāh Shūstari, 95.
 Nūr Turk, 102, 107.
 Oman, 8, 107.
 Orissa, 7, 88.
 Osmāniā University, 208f.
 Ottoman Caliph, 59, 61, 99.
 Oudh, 74, 93f., 97, 174.
 Pāk Pattan, 45, 143, 145.
 Pākistān Movement, 218ff.
 Leader of, M. A. Jinnah, 219, 220.
 Origin of name, 220.
 Partition of India, 221.
 Pākistān Government, 222.
 Constituent Assembly, 224.
 Constitution adopted, 224ff.
 Pākistān Women's Association, All, 337f.
 Palestine, 34, 172.
 Pan-Islāmism, 61-63.
 Parsees, 165.
 Patna, 189, 191.
 Patron Saints, 149f.
 Persia (Irān), 1ff., 55ff., 102.
 Persians, 37, 67, 87f., 176.
 Peshāwar, 87, 170, 190.
 Pilgrimage, The, 83, 86.
 Pirs, 111, 118ff., 133ff., 140ff., 151f., 160f.
 Polygamy, 239f., 262.

- Poona, 46, 106, 108.
 Press, The Muslim, 242-244.
 Propagation of Islam, peaceful,
 36-53.
 Punjab, if., 43ff., 135, 144,
 174ff., 195ff., 210.
 Purdah, 205, 237ff.
- Quādi, 29, 68, 92, 95.
 Quādiān, 115.
 Quādiānī sect, 268f.
 Quādirī Order, 110, 118, 128ff., 132f.
 Quārmātia, 101, 103, 107.
 Quaid-i-'Azam, M'd 'Alī Jinnah,
 110, 220ff.
 Qulī Quṭb Shāh, 65.
 Qur'ān, 18, 55, 76, 100, 156,
 169f., 173, 202.
 Quṭb-ud-Din Aybak, 23f., 64, 67.
- Rabwah, new headquarters of Quādiānī sect, in Pākistān, 268.
 Rae Bareli, 115, 188.
 Raḥmat 'Alī, C., 219.
 Rājputāna, 6f., 7, 148.
 Rājputs, 34, 44, 74, 176f.
 Rāmā, 169, 246, 180, 171.
 Rāmāḍān, Fast of, 69, 182, 171.
 Rāmāyaṇa, 163, 169.
 Rāmpūr, 94, 149.
 Razā 'Alī, Syed, 204.
 Religion, Freedom of India, 231ff.
 Pakistan, 231ff.
 Religious orders, 116ff., 131-136.
 Revelation, 203.
 Roman Catholics, 117, 165.
 Roshan, Pir, 111f.
 Roshaniyah, sect, 102, 111-112.
 Round Table Conference, 219.
- Šābiris, 127f.
 Šab'iyah, 88f, 100.
 Saints, Hindu-Muslim, 145.
 — —, Legendary, 146-148.
 — —, Muslim, List of, 130,
 137ff.
 — —, New, 150f.
- Saint, Patron, 149f.
 Saint-worship, 137-152.
 Sayyids, 102, 127, 176f.; dynasty of, 54.
 Shāh Jahān, Emperor, 24, 65, 97, 164.
 Shāh Wali Allah, 207.
 Shahid; 144, 148.
 Shari'at, 71, 120, 248.
 Shari'at Alhāh, Hāji, 49, 186f., 194f.
 Shaykh, 119, 176f.
 Shaykh-ul-Islām, 68f.
 Sher Shāh, Sultān, 14, 16, 69,
 83, 92.
 Shi'ahs, 47, 65, 75, 87ff., 94,
 178, 284.
 Shibli, 96.
 Shirk, 156, 186.
 Shrines, saints', 139ff., 142.
 Sikhs, 181, 190, 194.
 Sind, (Sindh), 3ff., 19ff., 101ff.,
 128f., 153, 157.
 Sistān, 43, 48, 124.
 Slavery, 4, 19f., 26-27.
 Smith, Wilfred, C., 78, 206, 217,
 220, 254.
 Social equality in Islām, 51f.
 South Africa, 1.
 South India, 33, 38, 48, 89f.
 Srinagar, 259.
 Šūfi doctrines, 116, 123, 142.
 Šūfism, 116ff., 155f.
 Šūfis, 117f., 155f.
 Suhrawardi order, 128f., 133, 180.
 Sulaymān, Mullā, 111.
 Sulaymāni Bohrahs, 104.
 Sultān Muḥammad Shāh, H.H.
 the Āgha Khan, 108ff.
 Sunni community, 55-115; 116-
 214.
 Sūrat, 88, 83, 105.
 Syed Razā 'Alī, 204.
 Syria, 35, 100, 134, 153, 189.
- Tabaqāt-i-Nāširi*, 22, 68, 77.
 Tāhmāsp, Shāh, 92f.
 Tālpūr dynasty, 64, 108.
 Taqlid, 202, 196.
 Ṭariquah, the Šūfi, 119.

- Tarīquah-i-Muḥammadiyah sect, 188ff.
 Tasbīh, 121, 156.
 Tawhīd, 156, 186, 196.
 Temples, Hindu, 10ff., 19ff., 22ff., 67, 76, 101.
 Tipū Sultān, 33ff.
 Tolerance of Muslim rulers, 13, 20, 42, 156-170.
 Traders, Muslim, 36ff., 40f.
 Traditions, (Ḥadīth) 60, 71, 76, 195ff.
 Turkey, 1, 62f., 99, 121, 211.
 Turks, 3f., 89, 176f., 198.
 Twelvers, The, 88.
 Uch, 43, 76, 129f., 145.
 'Ulamā, 66, 69ff., 93, 165f., 171.
 'Umar, the Caliph, 66, 69ff., 161.
 Umayyad government, 5, 55, 101, 153.
 United Provinces (Uttar Pradesh), 8, 52, 172f.
 United States of America, 1.
 Universities, Muslim, 204ff., 211-214.
 Urdū language, The, 162, 199, 203f.
 'Urs, 124, 142f.
 Uthmān, the Caliph, 3, 8, 55.
 Vedas, 156, 162f., 168f.
 Vishnū, 26, 107, 172, 182.
 Wahhābi reform movement, The, 186ff., 190f., 195, 213.
 Wahhabis, 49, 137, 152.
 Waḥy, 255.
 Wajd, 121.
 Walid, Ummayad Caliph, 8, 55.
 Waqfs, 69, 72, 105.
 War, The Great, 62.
 Washington, D. C., Mosques in, 268.
 Waṣl, 120, 142.
 Western civilization, effects of, 198ff., 203.
 Western India, 37, 45f., 52, 88, 106.
 Woking, mosque at (England), 267.
 Woman, Islam and, 251ff.
 Woman's Conference, The All-India, 238.
 Women's Association, The All-Pākistān (APWA), 237ff.
 Yaman, 43, 103f.
 Yogis, 156, 161, 168.
 Yūs Āsaf, 259.
 Yūsuf 'Ali, A., 109, 194.
 Zakāt, 69.
 Zākīr Husain, Dr., 212f.
 Zamorin of Calicut, 37, 39.
 Ziyārat, 140, 172.
 Zwemer, Dr. S. M., 147.

DATE DUE

JUN 12 2002

GAYLORD

PRINTED IN U.S.A.

MARYGROVE COLLEGE LIBRARY
Islam in India and Pakistan ; a
297 T53

3 1927 00115879 6

297
T53

Price Rs 5